Runs Farm with Apes. Trained Simians Do all the Work for Small Agriculturist.

The Cheever Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals has failed in its efforts to interfere for good purposes in the business affairs of Gottlieb Smith in regard to his manner of conducting his farm, says a Lesueur correspondent of the Chicago Chronicle.

Smith is a bachelor, a queer man, living all by himself and running an extensive farm, and nearly all the work on the farm is done now and for nearly twenty years has been done by a large number of trained apes of orang-outans.

These simians of our forefathers, it Darwinism is to be believed, are certainly remarkable beasts under the management of Smith, and it is his very success in taking care of them that has brought him under the fire from the protection society, for it is alleged in its papers that the simians who do the work on the Smith farm are so highly developed that they are not in any lower order of human beings, and that Mr. Smith is retaining them in his service as he does without their freedom, and without payment of any wages to them, is guilty of keeping slaves.

Many years ago there was a circus called out by Cheever—that is, creditors levied upon it while it was showing there and as the debts could not be paid the sheriff sold it out at auction, and the circus men who attended the sale seemed to want them and no body else made a bid.

He took them home and tamed them so that he could let them run around the place and then began teaching them to do many different things on the farm, beginning with simple tasks and gradually taking up more difficult ones as the animals became more intelligent.

The old animals were rather tender and delicate, but the younger ones raised were harder, and now they have become as tough and inured to the weather conditions in this latitude as the man who lives here. He has now about thirty of the animals, and they are a wonderful help to him.

They plow the land and plant the crops, they cultivate the corn and hoe the weeds; they pull the weeds out of the sugar beets, and one ape can do more work of this particular kind than six smart boys; they cut and bind the grain and shock and stack it; they haul the hay, grain, and fodder to the barns and do practically all the work in hauling the farm products to town; they tend the stock and feed the animals; they clear the stables and outbuildings and milk the cows, separate the cream and churn the butter; they do all the housework and the old "mammy" ape is one of the best cooks in that part of the country, and her canned fruit and berries, her dried fruit and preserves of all kinds would sweep all the prizes at the country fair if she were allowed to compete, which she is not.

In fact they do almost everything on the farm that the best kind of hired men and hired girls could do, and as they are very industrious and faithful, have no bad habits, never want to go off on holidays, and never demand any wages, they are fairly coining money for their owner.

On the other hand, it is the general opinion of the neighbors that no living beings are happier or better cared for than these apes. They have all the bright and showy clothes they care for, with red hats and blue hats and hats of every color; they have swings and merry-go-rounds and shops and balls and parties and cards and bicycles, but all these favorable conditions had no effect in keeping the members of the society from bringing their action against Mr. Smith, to prevent him from keeping apes in captivity. The court, however, made short work of the complaint, for as the court remarked, it was a case where the society for the prevention of cruelty to animals was taking interest in the apes and the theory that apes were not animals, but men, and that this notable inconsistency in the expert was favorable to the case, and the court threw it out and made the society pay the costs.
