

The Braes of Yarrow

An Historical Tale of the Sixteenth Century.

The suite of apartments occupied by her Majesty's husband was in the massive pile called David's Tower. Douglas, whose haughty spirit, love of power, and the pomp of power, overtook his caution, and tended directly to the calamity which soon fell upon himself and his mistress, with an impatient gesture dismissed the chamberlain who had conducted Barras to his presence.

"What tidings, Barras, and from whence?" said the Earl immediately after the door closed. "I'll tell you, my lord, and from Ettrick," responded Barras, with the serenity of tone and manner which flattered his master more than words could ever have done.

"Pronounce them promptly, then; for I'll tell you, my lord, and from Ettrick," responded Barras, with the serenity of tone and manner which flattered his master more than words could ever have done.

"But it is supposed that he was shot in attempting to escape." "Then Arran has one friend the less." "But by the negligence of his Majesty's courier, the pardon was lost."

"Since the man is dead there is no need for the pardon." Angus surveyed the speaker curiously as if comprehending that something lay beneath the question, and marvelling what it might be.

"Master Elliot risked his head to obtain the pardon, and little as I like him, I will not ask you how his mishap befell. Still were it shown that he had been careless in his embassy, it were enough to degrade him from the ranks of the Guard."

"Know you why?" "For no other reason, I imagine, than that he is a comely fellow, and devoted to her service."

"Barras smiled dubiously, and instantly made an effort to suppress the smile. "Does your lordship know how this Master Elliot first obtained his appointment to the Guard?"

"For some service he had rendered to Lady Mary Douglas, I believe." "Hum—and when your lordship was furnished with substantial grounds for suspecting that he was in the pay of my Lord of Arran, and you took occasion of his declaration to have him condemned—does your lordship know by whose intercession he was saved, even at the hour of execution?"
