in the summer wind, a sight of beauty. Then they came to the grass grown desert between the Rhodoper and the Balkans, and so on to the stern fastnesses of the hills. Sometimes the whole body of men would dawdle listlessly along, and others would go thundering along some rocky and precipitous pass at the wildest break-neck pace, as if the whole tribe had suddenly gone mad. When they got a chance to worry anything they took it, and bands of a dozen or so were continually prowling off to chase some domestic creature with hideous howls and whoopings and a storm of shots. They were provided with the Winchester-repeating rile, and it was a never-ending joy to fire at anything. The small birds on the telegraph wires were a great attraction to them, and when the wires had been cut in half-a-dozen different places the officer in command entered his first pretest by hauging a brace of his men, and so put a stop to the pet amusement of the rest.

There was a horse for sale in a Turkin's village on the green bank of the Maritza and Harry Wyane was the intending puchaser. The news that a bargain was being negotiated in the atreet ran from hour to-house. His fire. Voncrable graybardiffamed at the tidings; toddling infanorance considered in the street of the course of the word was greated him to treat a horse that had run riderless from a month of the course of the c

Beyond that the compulsion neither of fire nor sword should carry him. The interest of the crowd became, if possible more intense. The vendor fell to fifteen, the interpreter rose two. Then the vendor fell to fourteen, and the buyer rose three. Then came offers of twelve and four, and there the purchaser stood like a rock. At every novel offer the contending parties reparated and shook the dust off their feet against each other, but the crowd dragged them back again and insisted on the conclusion of the bargain. It was struck at last at seven, amidst a whirl of confusion which Bedlam broken loose could scarcely equal. Vendor and interpreter alike were filled with a sacred joy. The owner of the quadruped had fixed his mind on six, and the deputy buyer would have risen to eight Each felt that he had outreached the other, and was happy.

the deputy buyer would have risen to eight Each felt that he had outreached the other, and was happy.

In this wise our young adventurer was mounted. It was his first experience of a flurkish bargain, and for a while he was happier in the thought that the bargain had not led to bloodshed than in the business result of it, though an hour's trial made that seem eminently satisfactory. There was puch a change in the lad already that his late companions of the Five-Year-Old would hardly have recognized him. The fleroe sun and free air had tanned his face and hands to a deep brown. The Circassian cap of astrakhan hid his fair curls, and how wore a close-fitting tunic of the native cloth—the brown, fibrous stuff they call shyak.

On the day after his purchase of the horse, the Circassian regiment to which by Hamil's influence he was attached as volunteer received ite marching orders and started northward, its band raising inspiring music. They passed fair tracts of peaceful country where over the broad flat pastures the cattle grazed, and the villagers drove their terms effeld, and wide acres of maize, with its white hair waving
