Virgie's Inheritance.

Virgie's meeting with her father was quite bouching. Her mother never told her who he was. She had shrunk more and more from the ordsal as the time drew near when it must be revealed.

She had intended telling her the morning bollowing Lady Dunforth's reception when the had so unexpectedly learned that Sir William was Rupert's gardian, and she would have done so but for Mr. Thurston's visit, his startling revelation of her relationship to Lord Norton, and their sudden denartare from London.

She was glad new that she had delayed the communication, for when she now made t, she could soften the otherwise shocking intelligence by telling her that all the past had been but a cruel mistake, which at last had been but a cruel mistake, which at her father was a true and noble man.

Virgie came in from her walk just as her father and mother were speaking of Lillian.

"There comes Virgie," said her mother, starting up. "I must go to prepare her for meeting with you."

"There comes that it is a constant of the cons

The baronet bent and touched them softly.

"I am glad, my beloved, that you have not told her; the shock will not be so severe now. Go, dear, but send her to me as quickly as possible, for my heart yearns for her. I know now why her presence affected me so strangely the other evening."

He released her and she glided from the room to meet her daughter just outside the door; another moment and she would have contered.

"Mamma, what is it?" the young girl exclaimed, as she read in her expressive face something of the great change that had come to her during the last hour.

"Come with me, dear; I have something to tell you," her mother said, as she slipped her arm around her waist and drew her into a small room opnosites.

her arm around her water and drew her had a small room opposite.

In as few words as possible she told her all that had occurred and the name of her father—the name which she had so long witheld from her.

"Sir William Heath, Rupert's guardian, my father!" said the bewildered girl, look-ing utterly dazed by the startling informa-tion.

ing utterly dazed by the startling information.

"Yes, darling. It is a romance in real life is it not?—and one which will end more happily than such romances usually do," was the smiling reply, although there were tears upon the grateful woman's checks.

"That accounts for a great deal," said Virgie, musingly.

"Such as what, for instance?"

"Your strange actions the other evening when Rupert teld you who his gardian was."

"Yest 1 utterly lost my self-possession then, It was an unlooked-for shock, and I feared that matters were going to be terribly mixed when you came to marry Rupert. But, darling, we must not keep your father waiting, he is longing for you. Remember, he has never yet looked upon the face of his own child, to recognize her assuch."

"But, mamma, Virgie began, a startling thought coming to her, "you are—you are not——"

Then she faltered and stopped, her face covered with conjuston.
"I am, and I am not," is rather an ambiguous statement, is it not, dear?" was the arch retort, aithough her mother also flushed as she caught her menaning. "I understand your trouble, dear," she added, more gravely, "and everything is to be set right in a little while. This reunion will soon be properly solemnized, and then we shall go home together. Now go, and I will follow you in a few minutes.

She led the beautiful girl to the door, kiased her tenderly, and seut her to Sir William. Then she sped swiitly up to her own room, where, locking herself in, she fell upon her knees and sobbed out her grateful thanks for the great joy that had been sent to her that day.

Virgie, heart all aglow with love and happiness, went straight to the library.

Softly opening the door, she put her fushed, beautiful face within, saying, with charming eagerness:

"It is better so," the baronet murmured with a sigh. "It was better to have you think me dead, than guilty of the unfaithfulness which she was led to believe of me. But, my darling," he added, holding her off and gazing tenderly into her fair young face. "you are very like your mother was when I first saw her, and no wonder I was so attracted toward you the other night at Ludy Dunforth's."

"Were you," Virgle asked, looking up cagerly: "it is very strange, but it always seemed to me as if I had known you in some previous state of existence! The sound of your voice moved me deeply and I could hardly restrain my tears when you gave my on." It was the instinct of natural affection. Virgie looked up archly at these words.
"I think that you and Rupert must have a mutual admiration for each other," she said, "for he is very fond of extolling his guardian: and, papa, I believe—I think you are very nice, too."

Sir William laughed. It was very sweet to find her so fond; he had feared that, never having know what it was to have a father, she would be shy and reserved at first.

"There will be a mutual admiration between you and me if you say such pleasant things," he returned, with another careas. "How much you are like your mother!—the resemblance grows upon me constantly," he added, gazing closely into her lovely face, "all rave your syes; those, I think, are very like mine, my pet."
"Yes, and mamma has always told me that they are the dearest things about me for that reason," Virgie answered.

Sir William turned to gather his other Virgie into his embrace—she having entered at that moment—a happy smile on his lips at this fresh evidence of her faithfulness to him.

A Wonderful Cure.—Mr. David Smith, Coe Hill, Ont., writes: "For the benefit of others I wish to say a few words about Northrop & Lyman's Vegetable I took a very severe cough, had a virulent sore on my lips, was bad with dyspepsia, constipation and general debility. I tried almost every conceivable remedy, outwardly and inwardly, to cure the sore but all to no purpose. I had often thought of trying Northrop & Lymans Vegetable Discovery, so I got a bottle and when I had used about one half the sore showed evident signs of healing. By the time that bottle was done it had about disappeared and my general health was improving fast. I was always of a very bilious habit and had used quinine and lemon juice with very little affect. But since using three bottles of the Vegetable Discovery the biliousness is entirely gone and my general health is excellent. I am 60 years old. Parties using it should continue it for some time after they think they are cured. It is by far the best health restorer I know." 3
