'Arley cast that hateful document from her with a gesture of loathing. "I have half a mind to appear against him," she said; "it might be a blessed freedom to me as well; to have a divorce means nothing. I promised until death should part us'-and meant it. Shall I sit quietly down and allow him to have his way-allow the world to believe I deserted him, and make no effort to vindicate myself?" She mused a long time over these questions; but finally, with firmly compressed lips and uplifted head, she

"No, I will go and hear what he has to say for himself; I will face him, and let him know that I consider our marriage legal, if he does not. I will tell my story. I will tell how it happened that I deserted him. I will not tamely submit to this indignity." She sought a lawyer named Prowho could speak French.

Senor Proquelin saw that he had a woman of spirit to deal with, that she was on the alert, was keen-witted, and not lacking in decision of character. He saw, too, that she was comparatively helpless in this disagreable predicament, and that, from the lack of witnesses in her favor, the case was likely to prove a hard battle. But he was willing to undertake almost anything for money, while it was

He was also very keen at reading character, and he was not long in taking the measure of his opponent. He saw that he was very clever-that a case in his hands would be made the most of, and that he was as persistent as a bulldog at carrying a point; but one glance at that ill-shapen head showed him that cupidity was the strongest element of his character, and one morning he took the crafty man by surprise by paying him a visit in

The two were closeted a long time with doors locked, and curtains drawn close, and when at last Philip rose to go, there was a look of relief and satisfaction on his face, while Senor Proquelin followed him to the door with an obsequious bow, clinking a purse
