Yield a Privilege-Retain the Right.

A good deal of nervousness is being felt in North Toronto since the discovery that the Ontario Hydro-Electric Commission might find something in the agreement to purchase the Metropolitan which would be against the interests of the municipality. It was the general belief in the city hall that the agreement to carry package freight was nothing more than a recognition of the right of any common carrier to have his parcels forwarded over other lines to their destination. If this be all there is in the agreement which provides that the packages can only be carried in city cars, and must be transferred at the city limits by civic help, there would seem to be nothing to object to.

It is suggested, however, that the right that is proposed is not the right of the common carrier, but an entirely new and valuable right to be conferred respect, and right nobly the people on the Metropolitan company to have its packages carried on the Toronto Street Railway, which is not a common carrier, and that a new and most important franchise would be established the past, and the heroes of a century

CHAPTER XXXVII. For the first time in my life I was almost physically afraid, so keen was a sense of danger about me. Some-thing in Neil had struck hard upon my imagination. I could scarcely control the trembling that seized upon me as I heard the door close, Then I began to sob. I felt shaker and frightened—like a child. Presently I ceased sobleing. I was, however, inundated with self-pity, because, altho I loved my husband so dearly, he persisted in being almost a stranger to me. What could there be between him and Blanche Orton, that the death of her invalid husband should affect him as it had? was the secret between them? I was burning with excitement, yet there was something almost icy in me that tried relentlessly to probe into the heart of things that were causing me such anguish
