It is a hitterly cold night about the year 1840. Around the cracked, unpolished kitchen steve of one of Boston's humblest homes are huddled a man, his wife and family. The surroundings are of the plainest possible. Of furniture bring anything at a pawnshop, but of evidence of squalor and west there is abundance. Part of the two remaining chairs has just been broken up to keep the fire from dying out, and as the flames crackle with renewed life the man picks from the floor a dark looking substance and gazes at it with a longing that is pathetic. He holds it up and studies it with many a sigh that cuts the heart of his faithful wife and his loyal children. In changing this subdrops upon the hot stove. Here, then, was Goodyear, after year of varying hopes and unvarying ill fortune, in possession of a secret that was destined to place his name in the highest niche of fame. But this knowledge did not bring him immediate fortunein fact, this he never secured. He had lost the confidence of all who had help-ed him, and for two years his sufferings: surpassed even those of the years of experimenting. At this time he moved to New York, and it was said of him, "If you meet a man who has on an india with an india rubber purse, without cent in it, that is Goodyear."
