ALFALFA FOR HAY

Experimental Farms Note Tells

When to Cut it
The yielding capacity of alfalfa depends on quite a number of factors one of them being the time when the crop is harvested. The time of harvesting, indeed, affects the yielding capacity per acre of alfalfa more than it affects the hay crop, for reasons which will be explained briefly.

It is, unfortunately, a rather common practice among farmers to delay the cutting of hay crops too long under the mistaken idea that by waiting a little after that the crop has reached its best stage from a quality standpoint, larger and consequently more remunerative crops may be realized. This practice, however, works out rather the other way in alfalfa.

It is generally held that most satisfactory returns, both from the standpoint of tonnage per acre and from the standpoint of the hay quality, are obtained if the alfalfa is cut when, as it is generally expressed, it is "one-tenth in bloom." This expression really means that it is time to cut alfalfa just after it has started to come in general bloom. The blossoming is, in fact, on the whole at rather a good indication of the proper time to cut alfalfa; but it is not always so, for in certain seasons, especially if wet and cool weather prevails in the early part of the summer, the blossoming period may be considerably delayed beyond the best time for cutting the alfalfa for hay. Besides, it is not always easy to determine when an alfalfa field is "one-tenth in bloom," and, in case of doubt on that question, the alfalfa grower may easily be tempted to wait a little too long.

A far safer indication of the best time to cut for hay is given by the coming on of the second growth from the crown of the roots. The second growth generally begins to shoot just when the plants begin to blossom, but sometimes a little earlier. As the second growth is the one on which the size of the season's second crop of alfalfa depends, it follows that the first crop of the season should be taken off before the second growth has reached such a development that there is any risk of it being cut off with the first crop. And this might easily happen, if the cutting of the first crop is delayed too much, the result, of course being that the return from the second crop of the season is apt to be somewhat smaller.

Under the circumstances alfalfa growers would be well advised not to delay the cutting of the first crop any time after the second crop begins to come on. A simple extermination of the crown of the roots will show how the new growth is developing, and cutting of the first crop should take place before it is high enough to be caught by the mowers.
