Allan Charlton's Secret

out anyone seeing those wandering eyes and weak lips would know that they were gazing upon the face of a woman whose reason and intellect were overthrown—s woman who was neither more nor less than imbecile. Mad would be too strong an expression—she did not look that; there was not strength in look that; there was not strength in her for one of those terrible paroxysms that characterize madness. I could see that she required nursing, feeding and treating exactly as though she were a child. Who could she be? It was the face of Allan Charlton's wife—the face face of Allan Charkton's wife—the face he would not allow his daughter to see. The truth broke slowly upon me, but I saw it at last. The woman he called dead was living here — dead in life, hidden in these solitary rooms where no one ever came, treatek kindly enough, but a helpless imbecile; while he who called her dead was about to make Blanche Carew his wife.

controlled myself in the shock of that discovery. My brain was giddy— my limbs trembled. Of all solutions to the limbs trembled. Of all solutions to the mystery that hung over Woodleigh, I had never dreamed of this. Of all improbable secrets, one like this had never crossed my mind. It was well for me that Prudence remained in the inner room; with that shock fresh upon me, noted Helen's likeness to her unfortunate mother.

I had seen enough; I felt sick at heart. Cautiously and quietly I left theroom, and made my way down the narrow staircase. I retraced my steps through the empty rooms and the coldisitent passages. I came at last to the door that led into the gallery, from whence I could gain access to any part of the house. A mute feeling of horror seized me when I found it shut. A gust of wind had probably closed it, and the lock could evidently be opened only with a pass-key. I had overlooked that contingency, and I found myself condemed to spend the rest of the might in one of the empty rooms, where I crouched, fearful almost of my life. A thousand dreadful thoughts came into my mind. What if I should be found there—what if, worn out with fatigue there—what if, worn out with fatigue and excitement, I fell asleep, and Allan and excitement, I fell asleep, and Allan Charlton discovered me?

I went through an agony of fear in those few hours. What if Helena, or any of the servants, went to my room, and, finding me absent, began to search for me! Cold perspiration stood in large drops upon my forehead, my lips trembled, and my hands shook with fear.

My relief was great beyond words when I saw the myfrning sunbeams begin to gild the dusty, dirty windows; and presently I heard Prudence coming slowly along the corridor. My suspense was presently I heard Prudence coming slow-ly along the corridor. My suspense was so great I could hardly draw my breath; she unlocked the door, and went out, leaving it half open. The moment I thought she was out of sight I went after her. I hardly remember how I reached my room, but I found myself there at last, and the first thing I did was to lock the door, the second to burst into a fit of hysterical weeping —my nerves were overwrought.

was to lock the door, the second to burst into a fit of hysterical weeping —my nerves were overwrought.

It was only 6 o'clock, and I lay doyn to rest for an hour. I knew I had an ordeal before me, and I wanted leisure to collect my thought and prepare my plans. The whole matter was so incredible that at times I thought I must have dreamed it. That in this prosaic nineteenth century a man should venture to hide his burdensome, imbeelle wife in his own house; that she could have lived there for years perhaps, her presence unknown and unsuspected, that, with this fatal secret upon him, he should try to win one of the fairest and purest girls to be his—the thing seemed impossible; I could almost have laughed at myself—and yet from the certain evidence of my own senses I knew it was true. As I thought over all that had happened, I wondered at my own stupidity in not suspecting this secret before. Why should Allan Charlton have sought to hide from his child his mother's portrait;—or wished her to forget or never to know the face, so that detection should never overticke him from her.

Why should he hate the Grange and the rest of the care in the love me!" he cried. "She does nat." I abswered; "and even if she did—if she fored you as

I recognized the room at last. I remembered the staircase on the plan, and I knew that the room old Prudence used as her own was but a kind of anteroom to the secret and hidden partition the room, and the secret and hidden partition to the secret and partition to the secret and hidden partition and the partition ten years older."

When that girl threw her tender arms round my neck, and laid her blooming face on mine, I almost hated myself for thinking of the listless face, so like hers, that made me shudder as I remembered it. I could understand now why Allan Charlton did not seem to love his child as some men do. Every time he looked upon her a thrill of sorrow, shame and remorse must have shaken him.

I could not have made my escape.

The nurse was persuading her charge to drink some wine that she had poured out for her, and the poor patient tried feebly to rebel. When Prudence raised her I saw her face and head more clearly. There could be no shadow of mistake, not the least doubt in the world: with an irrepressible shudder I noted Helen's likeness to her unfortunate mother.

I had seen enough: I felt sick at heart. Cautiously and quietly I left the room, and made my way down the narrow staircase. I retraced my steps who made the state of the cold, through the empty rooms and the felt is the state of the speak.

I cannot describe the feeling of pity that seized me as I saw him standing awaiting me. He looked happier than usual: a kind smile lit up his dark face when I entered the room, and I stood still for a moment, knowing that, after he had heard what I had to say, years would elapse before he smiled so again.

I nerved myself at last. I sent Helena to ask Mr. Charlton if I could see him before he went out. She returned with a message to the effect that I must please be as quick as possible, for he was going directly.

"Papa has such a beautiful bouquet of flowers, Miss Wood," said Heelna. "Trial Must Begin Over Again.

"They are all white, white heath, white violets, white lilies and roses; and, do you know," she added, "I begged him so to give me one, and he would not."

I knew he intended them for Blanche—he carried choice flowers to her every day; and I said to myself, as I went to the library, that Allan Charlton would give her no more flowers; she had received the last she would receive from his hands.
