The Queen of Battle.

condition, well fed, wearing new uniforms and the best of equipment. The storm troops fight to the last, while the ordinary infantry surrender easily. This is proved by the course of the recent fighting. When the storm troops attack they take the Allied positions in front of them with comparative ease. Then they are withdrawn, and the ordinary infantry are put in to garrison the captured positions. The result is that when the Allies counter-attack they retake the positions with almost monotonous regularity.

Engaging Submarines.

From Commodore T. to H.M. Destroyer Sprint: "Submarine reported off Rocky Lighthouse. Proceed and destroy it. Seaplane in attendance." The signal is received by the skipper with a deep "Umph!" while a faint glimmer of delight passes across his hardy features. After a few seconds of hustle and bustle the ship is ready for sea.

The Noise of War.

"It's a curious thing," the battery major said—he was in bed, with a broken femur' holed to a sling—"but words are wholly lacking to describe a drumfire bombardment. One must be present to appreciate the stunning vehemence of that sound—the gamut of crashes and screams that make the earth quiver and recede in fogs of white and yellow fumes, or green and black and brown.

The Search.

A little vibration occurs as the destroyer comes under the strain of her powerful turbines, and she commences to glide slowly astern out into the more open space of the harbour. Once clear of all obstacles the engines are reversed, and we head past the boom defence, then into the open sea.

A Deposit of "Eggs."

Special word is then sent down to the engine-room, requesting every possible ounce of steam to be got up. We then follow after our scout. Further information follows that the submarine is again diving; but the seaplane will hover over the terrified Hun as a guide to us of her position. We arrive over the spot, and there deposit two large-size "eggs," each filled with very high explosive. At the same time the captain presses the spring-key and explodes the submarine in again diving; but the seaplane will hover over the terrified Hun as a guide to us of her position. We arrive over the spot, and there deposit two large-size "eggs," each filled with very high explosive.

The Fury of Sound.

"One's senses are shattered; one's soul covers in darkness with associate sounds of hideous meaning. For every note in the diabolic gamut carries visions of fear that blur the brain, and at the same time excite

The All-Round Man.

In the training of infantry, too, the difference is very apparent. In both the French and British Armies the aim is to make every man a first-class, thoroughly efficient soldier. Every battalion is trained in shock tactics, in machine gun work, and in all the other details of a soldier's job. The result is a general level of excellence, which gives a commander confidence that he can secure at least average results from any troops which may be at his disposal. A German general dare not attack without his quota of special shock troops because he knows that his ordinary rank and file are not equal to the task. A British, French, or American commander has no such worry, and can undertake any job asked of him with a fair degree of confidence.
