The Maiden's Choice

OR THE LAMB OF BIRKENLEUCH.

A Tale of the Covenanters.

"What—what mean you?" faltered the youth, turning pale as death, while he and Marion fixed a bewildered gaze on the glowing face of the excited Baronet.

"I mean just what I say—at Linton."

"Dae ye no understand me?" "Haur dae ye think I haebn this time?"

"Have you not been at Brankwood?"

"Brankwood! Puddin's and panchies! me at Brankwood, and you in the staiden cull o' the Tolbooth? Think shame o' yersel', Watty, for sayin' sic a word."

"Where have you been then, Sir Gilbert?"

"At Linton, ye prodigal!—at Linton! It was tae late time the gang there that I got the month o' grace, and by my certie the time has turned out short enough. But it's a' richt yit. I gained the King's rag at last, got yer pardon, and galloped down wi' it in my pocket, amiss without stopping, except to change horses."

Walter stood regarding him with an expression of utter bewilderment, struggling to comprehend his meaning, yet seemingly unable to do so. Marion was more quick of apprehension, but the reaction of feeling caused by the amazing hope engendered by his words made her unable to gasp out a syllable.

"Pardoned!" at length she hysterically shrieked.

"Oh ye think that's owre guid news to be true," exclaimed Sir Gilbert, clapping her affectionately on the shoulder. "Wait a wee then. Before I can take the prison I put the pardon into the hands o' the Commissioners, and the officers will be here immediately wi' the order for your liberation, and I want the pleasure o' bein' the first tae tell ye."

Walter had recovered from his stupor now, and in the fullness of his grateful emotion he folded the Baronet in a passionate embrace. Marion, also, with wildered rapture, clung her arms round Sir Gilbert's neck, and wept and laughed by turns.

"Oddsake, puddin's and panchies! you twa will haeb me smothered," cried the Baronet, actually blushing at the fervent demonstration.

"I can but faintly realise your goodness, murmured Walter. 'I feel as if your presence here is but a dream, and that I shall wake presently to the dark prospect which your entrance has changed.'"

"Deil a fear o' that, Watty, lad. There will be nae ladder for you in the Grassmarket the morn'."

"And you have done this unparalleled deed on my behalf—saved me from the scaffold—preserved me to life and Marion?"

"Dae ye think I was gaunnae see ye sacrificed as lang as there was the possibility o' savin' ye? No likely—puddin's and panchies, no likely. I failed in Embro, but thought I'd a' gey guid chance in Linton. I see, Watty, I had the guid fortune tae dae the service tae His Majesty King Charles I. when he was in Scotland. As guid turn deserves another, ye ken; an' on the strength o' that I made my way into the Royal presence. It was nae easy matter, though, an' day after day I was kept back. At last I got into the Park where His Majesty walks four hours every day, an' made bold tae address him. I tell ye my story, an' presented my suit, an' a little pressin' it took, for His Majesty is in a sair way about the insurrection in Scotland. He prevailed in the end. Yer pardon was granted on condition that ye leave Scotland an' live beyond His Majesty's dominions. I stuck up for a pardon oot an' oot, but His Majesty grew angry at that, an' I was fain tae be content wi' the savin' o' yer gair frae the gibbet. So, ye rascal, gin ye dinnae haeb daft enough an' dur eneuch tae quarrel wi' the terms, ye sall gang tae supper at my lodgin's the night."

Words would fail to describe the tide of happiness which rushed into the hearts of Walter and Marion when they found that the great peril was indeed escaped. Walter had no difficulty in accepting the conditions on which his life was to be spared. He had indeed resolved to go into exile before he was taken, and wait in Holland till the time came when he could be of any real service to the cause of the Covenanters.

That night he was liberated from the Tolbooth, and in three days he and Marion left the shores of Scotland, not knowing if they would ever see their native land again.

CHAPTER XV.—THE MIST AND HIS DAUGHTER—THE LOVERS.

Two years have passed away, and the bright sun of a glorious June day hangs in the western sky like a burnished shield, and illuminates with rich, yet mellow radiance, the fair scene around Birkenleuch and Grey-stone.

If we stood on an upland about a mile from the village and the Cleuch we should obtain a gorgeous view of a large portion of Nithsdale, the fertile strath, down the centre of which the river flows with silvery brightness, the clustering woods that adorn its banks, and spread in all directions in stripes and broad patches of richest variegated foliage; the fertile corn-fields, which the woods enclose and shelter; the grassy meadows, whose verdure vies with the living green of the glistening forest leaves—the wider and opener pasture lands stretching towards the extensive moors, whose deep brown surface is soon to be changed into purple by the bursting heather bells—and, last of all, the hills towering in the distance, their brows rising to the summer sky, and the sultry haze which had swathed them all day vanishing and leaving them clear and distinct in the mellow evening light, cast by the slanting sun.

The upland from which a view of this wide and splendid prospect is beheld had, at the time of our story, its crest traversed by a bridge path which formed a communication with the farmsteads and isolated cottages of the district. At certain points there branched away from its well-defined track, paths leading to the glens and lesser valleys, whose hamlets and solitary habitations were made the homes of the scattered population to whom the fields and moors and mountains gave labour and sustenance.

As the shadows of the landscape were beginning to lengthen and stretch eastward, a girl's lithe and graceful figure might have been seen in brisk motion as she came at a quick pace along the bridge-path with a basket over her arm, and in her hand the scarf which she had removed from her shoulders as a relief from the heat—increased as that heat was by the smartness of her exercise. She was a fair young creature, not exactly of station, as could be seen by the style of her dress, which was plain and unpretending; but her appearance presented the picture of health and happiness, and suggested the notion of a refinement of nature and an intelligence considerably above her class. Her dress was as we have said plain, but it was neat in the extreme, exceedingly tasteful, and fitted to get forth her natural charms with great effect. She did not seem to be much above twenty years of age, and had a beauty of feature and elegance of form altogether rare, and all the more pleasing that she was wholly without affectation, and seemed unconscious of the attractions which her appearance presented.

GRATIFYING PROMOTION.—The Head Quarters says:—The many friends of Sir James Carter, late Chief Justice of this Province, will be gratified to learn that the younger of his two sons, Mr. Edward Carter, has just obtained an "extra first class" at Hythe, and though one of the younger Ensigns in the corps, is now Instructor of Musketry and Adjutant.
