The Scrap Bag

If one cannot have lovely things, the next best thing is to read about them. At least to is so to me, and I hope with many of my readers. Beautiful things give pleasure when they are seen, and if by a strong effort of the imagination one can almost imagine one sees thee harming things described, why it's almost the same as having them isn't it? "Almost," but not quite, for, like Alice's beautiful scented ruches, which she found growing in dreamland, they "melt away so fast." But for a few brief moments, at least, one can cling fast to a lovely melting vision, and be very happy, at the smallest possible expense. For myself I could pore fore hours over the descriptions of beautifully furnishod houses, which appear every now and then in some of our most artistic magazines. Tastes differ to such an amazing extent, that it is not always wise to give one's preferences in such matters, but a scheme of coloring for a dining-room which I happened upon this morning gave me such a pang of pleasure, that I must tell about it, and ask you if you don't think it is perfectly lovely? It is a description of a dining-room recently completed at Newport, and if it were my room, which it never will be, or anything like it, for thest matter, I would have it all the same as it is now, except the walls. as I think I see it in my mind's eye

I would like a little delicate tracery of gold or silver to relieve the cold effect of the walls and octlings, which were, it is said, of immaculate whiteness, the dazzling effect softened by a thick surface of enamel. "The floor was carpeted in moss-green velvet, and hangings to match drape the doors and wide, deep windows with their inside curtains of embroidered Swiss muslin. The adecourds, center and side tables were of this same white enamel with hinges, locks and trimmings of silver. High-backed chairs built after an old French pattern, were white upholstered in green brocade, and the rare water-colors and etchings decorating the walls all framed in the prevailing silver and enow.

When at night the large crystal and argent lamps are lit up, the silk shades that look like big rosy blossoms and all the pyramids of wax candles wear they caps to match, this room i wear tiny caps to match, this room is a glimpse of fairyland. Under its influence every pretty woman is an individual Titania. Daffodils and violets give it an atmosphere of early springtime, Jacquiminot roses and palms transform it into a section of an Oriental retreat; it never appears twice alike and is the envy of every householder who passes under its cool subtle charm.

The lining of skirts through and through with silk is a sorry menace to economy, yet all swell dressmakers insist upon this proceeding. The peculiar "swish" of the silk lining against the silk petticoat has a fascination that is very "telling." A witty woman made us all laugh at a Christmas week luncheon, when the foggy muggy, treacherous weather was depressing us fearfully: "My new dress skirts are deplorably intemperate. As I walk in them across the room they sigh forth plaintively, 'whisky. whisky!'

Q.-When is a joke not a joke? A.-Usually!-Pick-Me-Up.

The Spectator in the Outlook tells a funny story of a baby toddling about in the sunshine, whose attention was suddenly attracted by a pretty iridescent beetle. He unsteadily advanced upon it, regarded it with interest for a moment, raised his foot, and, retaining his balance with difficulty. "squashed" it. It was not a pretty act, but it was nature unadorned. His little sister, 6 years old, was asked why he killed it. And she said: "Because the wasps stung him once." Not being a skilled entomologist, the baby declined to take any risks, but preferred the simple and easy method of the railway porter who declared. "Cats is dogs, and frogs is game, but turkles is insects," and charged them up accordingly. What are we to do with the caterpillars upon the vines? Are we to endow institutions for their benefit? or shall we ignore cool, subtle charm."

"Do you ever go to church?" asked a city missionary of a woman who had applied to him for assistance.

"No, I don't," was the raply. fact is, I ain't fit things to wear. My husband's been out c' work so long I've run out o' things; and, anyhow, me and my husband have such different views, I'd have to gr alone if I went at all."

"What are your views?" "Well, I'm a Methodist, and my husband, he's one o' these here Inights o' Pythias."-Youther Companion.

The seasen's dressing gown, too, has angel wings, as these big revers coming quite to the waist might be called. In some examples they are very wide at the shoulders, falling well over the sleeves; it is an interesting example of the use of materials that would once have seemed dissumant that the low neck of a dresing gown may be bordered with feathers quite as appropriately as with lace. Show gowns are also made with neck ruffles roses or violets anchored to the low bodices by straps of velvet, black usually, to show off the soft whiteness of the

Whoever has attempted the heart-breaking operation of stuffing this year's dress sleeves into last year's coat will not wender that the favorite cloak of the season has no sleeves at all, but gets there just the same by means of a generous cape covering the huge arm-holes. With such a garment length of skirt is a necessity; it may be trimmed or enlivened with a yoke-say of white satin upon dahlia velvet, and sparkling jet upon the satin-border with bands of fur which diverge all the way down its length to the ground. Such a cloak will have at the collar a roll of fur so high that the wearer can with difficulty look over it. The problem of wearing this year's doak ever next year's gown won't present itself, if one indulges in one of these perishable glories of satin and fur passementerie. It seems like a er piracy on the part of the milliners to bankrupt their patrons; but doubtless milliners have seemed always to be doing that since long before Napoleon locked up the Empress Josephine's most subtly successful modiste in a fit of desperation at her bills, bills, bills! The combintion of green and blue of not greatly dissimilar density of shade is one of the season's ways, which is rather trying to those of a dull color sense.

Fashions in Furs.

It was only a few years ago the fur capes came into vogue, and were nothing more than a mere shoulder covering, shapeless, and with what new seems to us a horribly dowdy air; yet they were received with open arms, and were considered the most fetching things ever worn. They were considered the acme of elegance and when a few daring women of fashion were them over a thin muslin gown when going for an afternoon drive the admiration of all the fair sex was excited, and then and there the fur cape, for summer and winter wear became the piece de resistance of the wardrobe.

every season saw something added to the fur cape. First came the little tilt as the shoulders, then the cosy high collar, then the added length, until the elbow was reached; new, last of all, we have the full sweep, with huge collars, perfectly flat at the shoulders, and ornamented in various ways with a contrasting fue, small heads of beasts, tails or rich lace.

There is no telling to what lengths this progressive garment may go; another season may find the entire figure enveloped in it. However, the cape of the present is as modish a wrap as a dainty woman can wear, and aside from its mere beauty, conderfully comfortable and proof against the winds, however chill. In keeping with the richness of the outside the linings are exquisite. Brocades are used in abundance, in tints to harmonize with the fur. A rich chinchilla cape has a lining of pearl gray satin brocaded with scarlet in a straggling fashion. The linings for ermine canes are especially lovely, in delicate color, mostly in soft yellows, blues or rose pinks.

Grav Hair.

American women in this last generation have discovered that at twenty-five their soft, well-groomed, richly colored hair has a most distressing way of turning gray. Whether this is the result of too much higher education, or bothering feminine brains unduly over problems our sensible grandmothers left to time and an all-wise Providence to settle, or the multiplicity of duties, social, political, financial and domestic, the modern damsel and matron feel called upon to consider and fulfil, no one can say. For a time, indeed, these gray hairs have greatly treubled the feminine population, until lately the matter has been settled by gray hair becoming markedly the fashion, -not only the fashion but the rage; and the grayer one's head shows, the more acutely one is envied by one's sisters, who now, instead of dipping their locks in "veird syrops' to turn the natural hair to gold or red, use alcohol to bleach away nature's own dye of brown or black. Interesting, but indeed deplorable, is the sight of debutantes with hair nearly as white as dames of seventy. The opinion is that with beight eyes and very rosy cheeks these venerable tresses bring out a striking and effective contrast; and many girls, who don't quite like to bleach their heads past redemption, venture only to whiten the soft curls about the face by daily dabbing them with cologne. Others yet more prudent, but stout sticklers for fashion, powder the hair lightly about the temples when in evening dress, and arrange the front a la Pompadour letting fall in a pretty fashion on their bare shoulders two big eighteenth-centur curls of snow-white false hair.

A very pretty coliar is of black velvet in three horizontal pleats. At each side are wings of black velvet and ostrich tips, in front of which are embroidered points. A gathered chiffon collar has large resettes at the sides, from which depend scarf ends trimmed with deep lace. This collar is very effective with a plain bodice. Another black stock collar has tiny ostrich tips alternating in black and yellow around the top edge of the collar, which | 31 years of her life in Mitchell. black sating

A very important decision has been given in the Appeal Court at Toronto, connected with promissory notes. The case was between Postmaster Elford, of Essex, and S. Collison, banker, Leamington. The latter held a note for $7,000, indorsed by Elford, and Collison did not notify him of its maturity for six years and eleven months, but renewed negotiations with the giver. Had the note ran for another month it would have been outlawed. The Assize Court ruled against Elford, but the decision has been reversed by the higher court with costs on the defendant. The decision declares that if a man indorses a note and the giver of the note fails to pay it, the indorser is not responsible if negotiations on the note have been renewed without the indorser's knowledge between the holder and the giver of the note.

A CURIOUS CASE.

Mrs. Hawley Confesses She Got Her Baby in Toronto.

Flushing, Mich., Jan. 13.-There have been some new developments in the Hawley case since Thursday. Readers remember that Mrs. Marshall Hawley, of this place, claimed that a heavily veiled woman placed a child in her care for a short time when the train stopped at Port Huron, and that she never returned to claim the child. When the reporter visited Mrs. Hawley she told a straightforward story and the same story that she has told her neighbors and most intimate friends, and even when the supervisor asked her if she ever applied to the Children's Aid Society, of Tore to, for the adoption of a child she stated positively that she had not.

Supervisor H. L. Freeman later reeived a letter from Toronto, which stated that Mrs. Hawley had applied there for the adoption of a child, and on account of the reputation of her husband, who is well and favorably known in that city, she was allowed to take the child. When the superto take the child. visor read the letter to Mrs. Hawley she still dended and declared that it was a "put up job," but when told that she would have to do something in the matter or the arm of the law would reach around her, she decided to coness, which she did.

Mrs. Hawley has dark hair and eyes. s about 23 years of age, and has showed herself to be a woman of iron nerve. She does not give any reason for the course she has taken in the matter, or why she took the child.
