on lectures in Ontario, at least during one session previous to graduation. This was found to be both expensive and inconvenient for our students, who would be compelled to go outside of Ontario to obtain a knowledge of homœopathy, at greater expense and extension of time."

"This spirit of unfairness was manifested during the five years of this Council, viz., from 1870 to 1875, and culminated in the refusal of the Council to elect Dr. Campbell, one of our men, to the office of President. This Act was taken as evidence of the continued enmity of the Council against our men. Further efforts to reconcile differences was considered useless on the part of our representatives, who retired in a body from the Council in 1873."

"The following year we went before Parliament, seeking incorporation as the Homœopathic College of Physicians and Surgeons of Ontario; our appeal was favourably received by the Government, the allopaths united their forces against us, and on hearing our grievances as represented to the house, and finding the Government favourable to us they at once proposed to grant us all we wished provided we would return to the Council. The Government thought it advisable, under these circumstances, that we should give a further trial to the Council, and in the event of any further injustice being done would grant us separation. This being agreed to, the Act was amended accordingly, and entitled the "Amended Medical Act," under which we are now working in harmony so far."

In accordance with the provisions of the Amended Medical Act we stood numerically in the same relation as Amended Medical Act.
under the Medical Act, viz., eight school men, twelve general profession, five homœopathists, and five eclectics."

"The resignation of homœopathists were not accepted by the Council, and they were still held to be representatives until by lapse of time a new election should take place. In
