love of his brethren, and to the admiration of his people. We hope our readers will acquaint themselves with a character, to which the piety of a son has yielded so fitting a homage. We cannot refrain, however, from expressing our obligation to the editor for having given us, in connexion with a sketch of his father's life, many details respecting the labours of other honoured ministers, who were engaged in the founding of Irish Methodism. The incidents which are woven into this volume would furnish a valuable contribution to a future history of Methodism in Ireland."—London Quarterly Review.

A DISCOURSE delivered in the Methodist Church, Drogheda, on Sunday Evening, October 18, 1863, on occasion of the death of the Most Rev. RICHARD WHATELY, D.D., Archbishop of Dublin, with a Brief Sketch of his Life and Character. By the Rev. WILLIAM CROOK.

"A very able discourse on an all-important subject, delivered on a most interesting occasion."—The Homilist.

"Dr. Whately held the doctrine that the soul lies in a state of unconscious torpor till the general resurrection. This doctrine Mr. Crook undertakes to confute, and to state what we believe to be the Scriptural view. He ably combats the notion that the Jews had no knowledge of a future state, and explains the Sheol of the Old Testament, and the Hades of the New. He also opposes Faber's conjecture respecting the locality of Hades, and grapples manfully with the sleep-theory of Whately. There are
