The Home Rule Question

Just when the British Government should be giving all their attention to the prosecution of the war, it is again "to be distracted by internal feud and dissension," brought about by those who are attempting to establish Home Rule for Ireland.
Shortly after the war broke out it was agreed by all parties that the Home Rule Bill should not become operative until after the close of the war.

It was generally understood that an amending Bill would be passed excluding the six counties in Ulster from the Home Rule provisions. Ulster did not want the Union between England and Ireland to be broken.

The Sinn Fein Rebellion broke out, for the purpose, it is said, of making Ireland a Republic, but more probably for the purpose of forcing the Home Rule Question or to create "internal feud and dissension" so that England may be hampered, to some extent at least, in carrying on the successful prosecution of the war.

It looks now as if the Rebels succeeded, at least partly, in their designs, for England's statesmen who are mainly responsible for the prosecution of the war had their attention divided because of the revival of the Home Rule agitation.

The Nationalists, led by John Redmond, are inclined to throw away an opportunity of bringing the Home Rule Bill into immediate operation by the retention of the Parliament of Northern Ireland, and the exclusion of the six Ulster Counties.

It is stated that Lloyd George in view of the failure of the Irish negotiations, of which he was the chief agent, has offered to resign his office, and if this occurs Premier Asquith will consider himself obliged to resign also.

Sinn Fein Outbreak

Cork, Ireland, July 16.—Chagrined by the non-arrival of prisoners who recently were released after undergoing imprisonment since the Dublin outbreak, a thousand Sinn Fein men were expected to arrive in Cork.
