Katharine's Sacrifice

AND THE PROPERTY OF THE PROPER

The thunderstorm had completely disappeared. Overhead the sky was as blue and cloudless as when she had started for her early walk. It seemed to her, in her nervous, distraught condition, as her nervous, distraught condition, as though Nature had been warned of the hideous tracedy that though Nature had been warned of the hideous tragedy that had taken place, and sent its awe-firspiring thunder and vivid lightning to protest against it. Gordon watched her suddenly, though his fear increased every moment, as she stood with her eyes covered, trembling from head to foot. He had been in too many awkward situations not to be able many awkward situations not to be able to raily his forces when a crisis came, and he was fast growing himself again, but for the uncontrollable dread of what would happen to him in the future if this were discovered. There was very little remorse in his heart over his mur-derous work; it was of himself he thought; and his blood ran cold at the bare shadow of the horrible fate awaiting him if this girl did not come to his

In Katharine alone lay his safeguard. In Katharine alone lay his safeguard. His quick, cunning brain worked on, planning and seeing every difficulty. Pate or the luck the devil is supposed to find for his children, was singularly kind to him. Craven Adair was not known by a single person in Ledstone or the country round. He had not even taken a lodging for the night; so his disappearance would never be remarked. Fraser's Mine, as has been said, stood absolutely alone and desolate; and even supposing that prying eyes came about the place—well, determined Gordon, with a shudder, the dark pit would guard its secret well—the dead man at the bottom was safely tombed.

Few people had met him in his quick walk through the town, to keep the in-terview he had written Adair to expect, and if they had, what more natural than that he should have followed his cousin that he should have followed his cousin to escort her in her morning's constitu-tional before breakfast?

All this flashed in swiftness through his brain; but, comforting as it was, his lips twitched nervously and his heart beat with sickening dread as he gazed at the girl's blanched, terrified face.

She was his last, his only chance!

She was his last, his only chance!

He set his teeth fiercely and choked down an oath. Would she save him, or would she set the police on him, and have him hunted like a dog! The bare suggestion made him auliver like a leaf, and at that moment Katharine seemed have him hunted like a dog? The bare suggestion made him quiver like a leaf, and at that moment Katharine seemed to wake from the semi-trance into which she had fallen, and looking about her with a hurried, fearful glance, she began to walk away; the dog Carlo, who was shivering as if he understood some awful thing had happened, following her with a low whine of pleasure at leaving the place.

But he gripped her two hands in his. "You are going home—home to my mother, to sit down quietly and see my ruin. Katharine, have you no heart, no pity? I tell you that my life is in danger, that I am in your hands! You must speak! Katharine, you will save me—you mustshave me! I am a desperate man!"

She lifted her woonderful gray eves to er breast.

She looked down as he paused, then,
n a quiet, clear voice, she said:

"Come with me!"

Gordon's bloodshot eyes moved ner-nce.

"Come," she repeated, curtly, and retching out her hand she dragged him is her side—for his strength seemed to ve way beneath the perfect agony of ar that swept over him. "Now year," she said, passionately; "swear er this grave that if I become your file, you will leave me utterly alone; will leave me utterly alone:

wife, you will leave me utterly alone; you will never come near me, or dare to approach the for a single moment. Swear, I say!"

Swear, I say!"

The man's face was ashen white, and great beads of cold perspiration stood out on his brow. Like all cowards, this close contact with the scene of his crime perfectly unhinged him: but still his mind did not neglect himself. Hurriedly, in thick, muttered words, he took the oath she demanded, averting his gaze from that horrible pit which seemed to him to be full of hundreds of staring eyes fixed hungrily upon him at every point.

word, and I will not draw back. Make what plans you like, I will agree to them, but—but do not come near me too often, or my strength, my resolution may fail me at the last moment, and I may shrink from taking a husband on whose head rests the blood of an innocent man, on whose soul lies the arrely in of murdu!" awful sin of murder!"

About sixteen or eighteen miles from Ledstone was situated the charming ca-thedral city of Northminster. No great-er contrast could be possibly smagined than that which existed between the than that which existed between the pretty Gothic-built Northminster, and smoky, noisy, busy Ledstone. The inhabitants were mostly of a clerical and milltary description, among which were scattered here and there one or two scions of aristocratic families, whose poverty were only equaled by their pride and whose raison d'etre appeared to be to rule over Northminster society in a haughty and determined fashion, and to this rule it must be confessed Northminster cheerfully and willingly consented.

two of these families, but perhaps the head of them all, and the verifable so-cial queen in this peaceful cathedral town, was Lady Blanche Bellairs, the widow of a naval commander, who had been both a brave and splendidly con-

Against Lady Blanche's will there was absolutely no gainsaying. No per-son was considered in society unless graced by Lady Blanche's approval, and woe to the unfortunate individual who himself or herself against this dras-code, for their lives were not of ch account afterward — that is, if y still continued to reside in North-

She resided in a delightful, three-cornered old house, that was full of curiosities and valuables, brought cruises, and although there was un-doubted grandeur, still there was a disdoubted grandeur, still there was a dis-tinct air of comfort and enjoyment throughout Maple-Tree House. Lady Blanche Bellairs was never so happy as when young voices were echoing in the hall and low, rambling rooms. She was childless; no one had ever heard re-gret on this subject pass her lips, but upstairs, in the corner of her jewel-case lay a folded paper with a lock of soft, golden hair, cut from the head of the baby that lived only to rend the moth-er's heart with grief over its untimely a low whine of pleasure at leaving the place.

Gordon's breath came quick and fast. In two strides he was beside her.

"Katharine," he said, in tones so full of fear and excitement as to be almost musuadible, "where asre you going?"

"I must go away from here! Away!" he murmured, half vacantly. "Let me pass!"

But he gripped her two hands in his. "You are going home—home to my mother, to sit down quietly and see my protect, to sit down quietly and see my protect. Katharine, have you no heart, to play it is in danger, that I am in your hands! You must speak! Katharine, you will save me—you be me—you must speak! Katharine, you will save me—you be me—you be me—you must speak! Katharine, you will save me—you be me—yo must speak! Katharine, you will save me—you mustlsave me! I am a desperate man!"
She lifted her wonderful grey eyes to his face.
"Why should I save you!" she broke out, swiftly. "Why should you not die as you have made him die! No, no, her voice grew choked and hoarse, "I—I can have nothing to do with you. I—"
"Then you will see my mother diefor how will she live when I am gone?—without lifting a hand to help her?" Gordon's face was white to the lips. Time was flying, and there was not a moment to be lost. Before night came on she and he must be far from here. He would not breathe in comfort till he had left Ledstone far, far behind, and had Katharine scout for a moment gazing at him. A strange calm had come upon her.
"Go on," she said, curtly; "tell we were were in the comfort, the fer-west strength, his comfort, the fer-west strength as favorite, the warmth of her hear targeting fiven to Lord Otway, eldest son of her brother, the warmth of her hear trother the order to Lord Otway, was full can bright, pleasant young fellow this Or-mande, Lord Otway, was full of life and vigor in every nerve of his tall, and hird for lower persent Earl of Thanecourt, and her of course, to the tile, such a fright, pleasant young fellow this Or-mande, Lord Otway, was full of life and vigor in every nerve of his tall, and hird, there were many who cheered and admired his strength and the same to Lord Otway, was in the Church—a profession he had taken up at his own express desire; and if there were many who cheered and admired his prowess in the cricket field, there were on the course of the course of the s Katharine stood for a moment gazing at him. A strange calm had come upon her.

"Go on." she said, curtly; "tell we what you wish me to do."

All at once a vision of the mother's sweet, sad face had come before her cyes; the memory of Lucy Swythe's devotion, idolatry, rose to her mind; the remembrance of the many thousand acts of womanly love she had received surged in her heart. What was it he said?

This mother would die if were gone, and she, Katharine, alone could avert that.

Over and over again she said this to herself in a dull, mechanical way, while Gordon poured out a string of wordsappeals, entreaties, prayers—in a fear ful, low, hurried manner, that dimly roused a feeling of contemptible pity in her breast.

She looked down as he paused, then.

In the July of the year in which this story opens, however, Lord Otway took a short holiday and instead of going to Thane Castle and his family, chose to run down to Northminster and stay with his aunt. Lady Blanche Bellairs, who happened to have as a guest at the saue, time a young lady whom she was in no wise loth to put in the young man's way. "It would be a good arrangement, mused Lady Blanche, on a hot July ofternoon, as she sat under the trees in the garden and watched four young reople play a game of lawn tennis. "Any one can see she is half-way in fove with him, and ber money would be a soleddid thing for Otway!" and Lady Blanche sighed.

"She is pretty," the lady mused 'n.
"Yes, Barbara is certainly pretty; and although Ormande is in the Church, he can appreciate feminine beauty as well as anybody. Well, young reople?" This was said out loud, as a slight, girish figure and Lord Otway's broad, manly, one approached her chair.

"I am no use without my own rack". Lady Blanche! I never can play without it," observed Miss Barbara Mostvi, sinking into a garden chair, with a slight frown on her pretty, babyin face.

"Has it not arrived yet? I thought you wrote for it to be sent, my dear." Lady Blanche pursed up her lips. "I must complain to the station-mast": things are very much delayed now-adays."

to inquire for Miss Mostyn's tennis rack-"I'll go myself, Aunt Blanche." Lord "I'll go myself, Aunt Blanche." Lord Otway sprung to his feet in an instant. "I assure you, Miss Mostyn, I shall enjoy the walk," as Barbara uttered a protest to this. "I want to do a commission for myself. I shall bring back the racket in triumph, and shall expect to be well beaten for my pains."

Barbara Mastyn watched him stride away, with mingled feelings of elation away, with mingled feelings of elation and annovance. It was decidedly pleas and annoyance. It was decidedly pleasant that he should go all that way to gratify her wish, and yet she would have preferred him to stay here in the cool and talk to her. She admired him immensely, this spoiled, petted child of fortune. If she had one regret about him it was that he should be in the church. To Miss Mostyn it was perfectly incompreehnsive that a future earl should willingly give up his whole life to work for others, and she was altogether too shallow to recognize the sweetness and beauty of this man's mind. All she cared about was how she looked in his eyes and the chance she had of becoming Lady Otway, and the future Countess of Thanecourt, a position which held decided charms for her.

Little did she think, as she sat under the trees this July afternoon, that as Lord Otway strode away in the hot sun to fetch her tennis racket, he was going to meet one who would utterly destroy the airy castles her ambitious wind had pictured and live in his heart. ant that going to meet one who would utterly de-stroy the airy castles her ambitious mind had pictured, and live in his heart
