On de contrary, when my father wrote him that his negroes cents, that he felt very much relieved at their going, and heped steps might be taken to provent their return, especially that old rascal Shack, who had been at the bottom and cause of all the laziness, lying and theft of the gang.

To understand and appreciate this it is only necessary to know that the old colonel, like many of the more conscientious first settlers of Kentucky, was at heart an abolitionist. He persisted in going through the forms of work, sometimes to the vexation of my father, out generally to the amusement of all the family. As the body servant of the old cotenel through two wars, it was entertaining to note his sense of superiority over all of us, and the care he felt for the old colonel's dignity and repusation. The old gentleman used to relate that there was but one occasion when Shack forgot himself and the respect due his master. That event happened when in full retreat, on horseback, from the Indians, after a frightful defeat and massacre. The two came upon a swamp. The colonel, reining up his steed, turned to Shack and

Well, Shack, what shall we do here? 'Lor bless you, missah, dis no place to conversate!' cried the pour negro, driving past his master and plunging into the ewamp, for in the distance he heard the yells of the pursuing red men.

Fortunately, the Indians missed their trail and went off to the left, leaving the colonel to pull his servant out of the quagmire.

Much of my boyish entertainment con sisted in ricks played upon old Shack. He was extremely superstitions, and generally attributed my doings to the active interference of Satan.
