The fire burned for a distance of over a mile up the mountain side from the Chemainus river. On Sunday it came within a few yards of the mine buildings and quite a hard fight resulted. Men worked all night long battling the advancing fire with streams from hydrants on the mine property, and by digging trenches, beating and other means.

The fire was still burning at last reports, but it was thought, unless a gale sprang up, that the camp was no longer in danger.

The residents of the vicinity packed their belongings and removed them to places of safety, and every man available was brought out to fight the fire. The stage road from Duncan to Mount Sicker was impassable because of the fire, which covered considerable ground, pieces of burning bark being carried at times for a distance of a quarter of a mile. The Tyee Copper company lost considerable cordwood and standing timber, and the timber losses will be heavy.
