Their third son had been the last of their children to pass away, and in dying he had left an only child—a boy, named Oliver, then in his fifth year—in the care of the aged couple.

This grandson they had loved dearly and devotedly. He had been educated at the best schools. At the age of 16 he had entered the freshman class at college; at the age of 20 he had graduated with hongr; then he had entered a law school, and in his twenty-second year he had been admitted to the bar, to practice in all the courts of the state.

admitted to the bar, to practice in all the courts of the state.

Up to this time Oliver had cost his grandfather only the expenditure of much money. His shortcomings, his sowings of wild oath, his disalpations, great and small, had been so carefully concealed that the good old man never suspected.

But the time came when the grandfather did more than suspect. When Oliver came to him after he had opened his office in the the city, and boldly confessed that he must have two thousand dollars, the old man knew that no legitimate cause lay at the bottom of that call.

"Dear boy, what is it for? Can you not trust your old grandfather so far?" the only answer he received was:

"Ask me no questions and I will not deceive you. I will repay you when I as you may think. A cheque for two the last penny I have on deposit. Ah, you do not know how heavily you have drawn upon me of late."

"Well, well, grandfather, I am sorry. You will bid grandma good-bye for me. I

His evil course had been going on for a long time.

He had joined a dangerous club when he had first opened his office, and that club—its influences—had proved his ruin.

"I bought his small library," the informant said. "He sold everything he could sell and left. That was a week ago this very day. I asked him which way he was going, but he would not tell me. I only know that he went to New York from here, but I am very sure he did not intend to remain there."

The old man, ever since the stranger if he was hungry. If so, she would gladly give him to eat such as they had. He thanked her kindly. He had eaten a hearty supper at the village inn, and could eat no more.

The old man, ever since the stranger had crossed the threshold, had been trembling under the influence of a strange fancy and as soon as the opportunity was offered after they were seated he said, with a yearning eager look:

In a small, comfortable, vine-embowered cottage, in one of the pleasantest valleys of New Hampshire, not many years since, lived Leander Heradon and his wife. His life had been rounded out to the full apan of three-score and ten, and she was only two years younger.

But it was too late now to regret.

"Well, Betsy, I suppose our life in the dear old home is at an end. Mr. Walters will take possession on Monday. I shall waive the auction. The aged wife did not speak. She could not. Her heart was full and near to breaking.

"We must go!" the old man moaned after a little silence.

And then the weeping matron spoke. The wail burst from her in spite of her firm resolve to keep it to herself.

"Oh, Leander, little thought we in the happy days, that our life's late evening would be spent in the—" The sorrowing husband put out his hand beseechingly, but the wife went on after a slight hesitation; "in the alms house. Oh, Heaven, have mercy."

At the outer door, protecting the flame of the candle with his broad hard palm, the old man could distinguish, dimly outlined in the starlight, the form of a man, seemingly upright and comely to look upon. He stepped back within the little vestible, and bade the stranger enter.

"Do you always admit thus boldly to "Oliver!"

At the outer door, protecting the flame of the candle with his broad hard palm, the old man could distinguish, dimly outdid, as he had often done before—just what he knew he ought not to have done—he gave the youth the check.

A year passed from that time, and on a Saturday evening, when Oliver was expected, he did not come. Nor did he come on Sunday.

"Do you always admit thus boldly to your dwelling people whom you do not know and that, too, at night?" queried the applicant laughingly, as he stepped over the threshold.

"I have great confidence in my fellows,"

Oa Monday, not more to satisfy the anxious grandmother than to settle the matter in his own mind, the grandfather harnessed his best horse and drove to Burlington, where his grandson had his office.

He found the office closed, and on looking in at one of the uncurtained windows, he discovered it to be empty.

With a sinking heart, he called upon another lawyer in the same building, of whom he inquired after Oliver Herndon.

"Ah, poor fellow? he's gone. Eh? Pardon me. I did not think. You are his grandfather?"

"Yes," said the old man, sinking into a seat.

And then, very kindly and considerately, the story was told.

Young Herndon had got into several acrapes, the worst one laying him liable to a felon's doom if he could be found guilty. His evil course had been going on for a long time.

He had tained a dangerous club when.

And with this information the old man went home.

Of course he had to tell his wife the simple truth, after which she posted him off to New York in search of the prodigal.

He resisted with all his power, but his power was not sufficient.

He went to New York, and was gone

After they were seated he said, with a yearning eager look:

"Good sir. you let fall a remark as you entered which would seem to indicate that you came from where the christian grac's are rare. May I ask whence you came?"

"First," responded the young man, he was not more than five-and-twenty at the farthest—"let me be sure that I have atruck the right haven. Am I speaking struck the right haven. Am I speaking with Leander Herndon and Betsy, his

"'You are, sir."
"Good! I thought I could not be mistaken. Will you tell me," he went on—in a way so frank and kind, and so masterful the east.

A week later an officer—a notary—from Burlington, called upon Leander Herndon with two promisory notes, one for fifteen hundred dollars, and one for two thousand, signed by "Leander and Oliver Herndon!"

At first the old man could make nothing of it; but, at length, with the assistance of the notary, he called to mind the two years previously his grandson had persuaded him to join with himself in taking a certain patent for their county or state.

told his story without reserve.

"May I ask you, 'sir," the visitor said,
"how much money would be required to pay every debt you owe in the world and set you back into the old life of ease and comfort, so far as pecuniary matters are concerned?"

The old man considered a moment and regular copartnership, and advertised their patent under the firm title, "Leander and Oliver Herndon." And not a step had ever been taken, or a movement made, teward the dissolving of that partnership.

So, upon the production of published advertisements acknowledging that firm name, the holders of the notes could legally hold the senior partner for payment. The old man at once set himself to the work of raising thirty-five hundred dollars. He had not a dollar in bank, but instead of that he owed the bank for money overdrawn.

"Would five thousand do it?"

"Hold on!" interrupted the visitor.

"Let me speak. My name is Charles Staples. I was with your grandson, Oliver, in California, and through me your boy speaks to you from atar off. From beyond the grave comes his earnest heart-sent prayer for forgiveness, and from the succor."

"Dear old people, your boy died a repentant, hopeful man. I was with him to the last, and he died upon my bosom. He

Three years have passed since that harrowing time, when, on an autumnal evening, as before stated, we look upon the aged couple in their darkened home. And during the coming week they are to bid farewell to the dear old home.

The old man's strength has failed; his energies are broken, and he can hold up no longer.

During the two years last past he has failed to pay the interest on the mortgage.
