MODERN CANAL BUILDING to the proposed deep waterway via the St. Lawrence is that of cost. It is in whole problem turns. Upon no other branch of the case should the convention be better informed than upon that of probable cost. It was stated by the cost doubt and refritories lie wholly or in part within its confines, which embrace two-fifths of the national domain. The soil of its plains and valleys is of probable cost. Upon no other branch of the case should the convention to better informed than upon that of probable cost. It was stated by the Minister of Railways and Canals that it would cost $130,000,000 to make a 20 foot channel from Lake Erie to Montreal. But as we understand it, this estimate was made in the rough and will no doubt be wide of the mark when details are carefully examined. There is one fact that will help us a little in deciding on the magnitude of the work. The Dominion Government has already decided on a policy of enlarging the canal system from nine to fourteen feet, and we have not been told that any enormous sum will be required to complete the work. The Dominion Government has already decided on a policy of enlarging the canal system from nine to fourteen feet, and we have not been told that any enormous sum will be required to complete the work as one that it feels fully able to complete without treating it in any way has an exceptional or extraordinary undertaking. One would naturally suppose that the enlargement of the eyestem from 14 to 20 feet would not involve a great deal more than the enlargement from 9 to 14. It it is decided to proceed with the work we will have the benefit of the most recent and effective modern mention on the new waterway from Chicago to the foult of Maxico we learn that the excavations in the next very or three years the nonzy recent and effective modern mention on the new waterway from Chicago to the Gult of Maxico we learn that the excavations in the last size of Harper's Weekly on the next very or three years the nonzy invested in the construction of the new waterway from Chicago to the Gult of Maxico we learn that the excavations in the last time of Harper's Weekly on the next very or three years the nonzy invested in the construction of the new waterway from Chicago to the four the reconstruction of the new waterway from Chicago to the next very or three years the nonzy invested in the construction of the next water in a great of the process of

The drainage canal is a practical university, in which several hundred active minds are being trained as Americans have never been before in the work of canal-making. It is an object lesson to the investing public, who will finally awake and send forth its army, of civilians to execute the next step in the awake and send forth its army of civilians to execute the next step in the world's progress—the building of the Nicaragua. The men are ready; the machinery of success is evolved. Those who will study the Nicaragua in the light of actual achievements here will know that the day is past when its practicability or its imperative need can be questioned. That other cities will seek the recognized benefits of deep waterways is assured. New York cannot long suffer the limitations of the Eric Canal. She must recarve that route or cut herself a passage through the low Champlain Divide to the St. Lawrence. Having conquered the dominion of the land in unexampled railway extensions, American enterprise the dominion of the land in unexampled railway extensions, American enterprise must seek and hold the sea. We should stimulate and develop to the utmost the commerce of our rivers, of our lakes and of our coasts, and we must win back our lost place in the world's carrying trade. For this work there is no city, to-day equipped like Chicago, whose outstretched hands of power, touching two gulfs, shall clasp a continent.

We trust the committee will see to it that the convention is adequately informed by competent experts as to the extent

The difference in the traffic is no doubt attributable to the bicycle, which has become so populan in Toronto during the present year. Considering the largel number of people who ride the wheel we are surprised that the deficiency is so small as it is. It has been estimated that the company's receipts would be $200 a day more if there were no hierales in use. The bicycle is bound no bicycles in use. The bicycle is bound to become a formidable competitor of the street car in the future; The wheel will be improved from year to year, and each improvement will make it more desirable. It will also be reduced in price to as to be within the means of all classes of people. Another condition that is working in favor of the bicycle is the improvement in our roadways.

HER MORAL PERFUME.

AN INTERESTING PAPER BY MRS. LYNN LINTON.

The Beauty of the Spiritual Light That Shines From the Eyes-It is a Differ-Beauty of the Most Lustrous of Orbs -The Exquisite Quality of Moral Per-

July

In what does it consist? Where does reside? Who can describe it? Init reside? Who can describe it? Indeed, it is not as impossible to dissect as the odor of a flower? Intangible though self-evident, subtle though all-prevading, it would be as easy to describe a melody without notation as to put into intelligible words this exquisite grace and gift of God—this lovely charm we call concretely moral perfume. Thus writes Mrs. Lynn Linton in the London Queen. Yet how eloquent it is! Just as the moss rose, hidden by the tall grasses in the vase, makes its presence Just as the moss rose, hidden by the tall grasses in the vase, makes its presence felt in the room, so does this quality of moral sweetness reveal itself in the looks and manners of its possessor. Bright eyes are not infrequent; but the spiritual light which shines from these eyes is something different from the physical beauty of those lustrous eyes, whereof poets write-and lovers rave. whereof poets write and lovers rave. Even in old age this fine spiritual light remains undiminished; and when the lustre has gone, and the thickthe lustre has gone, and the thick-thronging humors of advancing time have robbed those orbs of all former beauty, that sweet, mild ance born of the pure and gentle spirit still lingers, like the perfume; and the immortal beauty of a high morality pro-claims itself once more as so often before. claims itself once more as so often before.

She is not what the world calls pretty, and her figure would not enchant a sculptor. Side by side with her young sister she is of the genus Hodmadod, where that young sister would rank as a sylph or a nymph. But contrast the two—she who has every physical charm that goes to make up a beauty and she who has none, and then say on which side you would give your verdict—which of the two you would create queen among women, and one of the elect beyond the stars. Over the pretty face of the ohe lies the unmistakable shimmer of moral shallowness. She is bright, animated, interested—but only in matters personal and recreative. Of enthusiasm for aught beyond herself she has not a trace. Of the power of self-forgetfulness, or self-sacrifice, she has not so much as would air beyond herself she has not a trace. Of the power of self-forgetfulness, or self-sacrifice, she has not so much as would enable her to give up with a good grace any, the most trifling, pleasure for another's benefit. She knows no more of high morality than she does of mathematics; and though she would do nothing overly evil, she is incapable of doing anything heroically good. She is just a beautiful woman of charming manners and fascinating personality. And there she must be left. If you want the nobler flights you must turn to the sister whose form would not enchant the sculptor, whose color would not fascinate the painter, but whose moral perfume, enveloping her in a cloud of spiritual radiance, makes her lovelier than ever was she whose beauty was the torch that set fire to Troy and burnt its topless towers. You cannot define it, but you feel it. If you want wise counsel generous aid, deeds of self-sacrifice, the preference of the right as against the convenient, you must go to this less personally but more morally beautiful sister. And you will not be disappointed; for that widow's cruse of oil was not more inexhaustible than is her sweet store of goodness; and nature herself is no more bounteous than is our friend in sympathy and sacrifice.

Even at first sight her moral beauty in sympathy and sacrifice.

Even at first sight her moral shines out—the moral perfume inseparable from her personality makes itself felt. Tall, handsome, well-conditioned, well-endowed all through, her material circumstances are those to tempt most women to a life of self indulgence and of pleasure. Small blame would attach to her were she to spend her substance in the enjoyment of those country pursuits to which she was reared and in which she takes such frank delight—in and sacrifice which she takes such frank delight—in the horses she loves so much, the costly which she takes such Trank delight—in the horses she loves so much, the costly garden she appreciates, the greenhouses and hothouses she understands. Instead of this she gives herself and her fortune to good works in London. She visits the sick, helps the poor, consoles the aged, teaches the young. In the seething summer weather, when others are luxuriating by the seaside, she remains in her heated metropolitan home, that she may give pleasure to her poor pensioners, and let them enjoy the excursions into the country which are heaven to them and such fatigue to her! And the nature which prompts her to do all this comes out in her eyes, her face, her voice, her bearing. At first sight you say she is divine. It is the moral perfume of her soul which speaks in her outward personality; and no one who has trusted to this first impression has turned away deceived and dissillusioned.

Nothing but itself can produce this Nothing but itself can produce this exquisite quality of moral perfume. Cleverness does not give it, nor does even kindness, when unaccompanied by the higher attributes. For kindness can be, and often is, of a purely instinctive character, a mere attribute of that feeling which we call sociability—and which is the great tie and bond between man and man. Moral perfume cannot exist without kindness. So far is certain. But kindness can exist without moral perfume; and unlovable natures may be But kindness can exist without moral perfume; and unlovable natures may be generous on occasions. Nor can we say that this subtle grace consists solely in the faithful doing of our duty. We all know strict and upright men who do their duty with punctuality and exactness. But of love, or, from or for them, there is as little as there is blood in a stone or skin on the face of a fiint. No! it is not to be found in duty, pure or simple—nor yet in innocence, pure and stone or skin on the face of alimt. Activities not to be found in duty, pure or simple—nor yet in innocence, pure and simple. For sometimes the very innocent are the mortally stupid; and the mortally stupid have no moral perfume about them. Nor can we find it in sympathy alone; for the sympathetic may be the unwise by reason of the very sympathy wherewith their judgment is obscured, so that they become dangerous advisers and disastrous 'bottle-holders' in a frav between ourselves and the stranger. No! we come round to the starting point—this moral perfume, of which we are all sc keenly conscious when it exists, is of the nature of things not to be analyzed as to its essence, nor described as to its methods of self-expression. It is. We see and feel and know it: but only when we can describe the perfume of a flower or the song of a the perfume of a flower or the song of a bird can we give the exact recipe and catalogue and ingredients.
