Antacid Usually All That Are Needed.

"If you have dyspepsia, indigestion, sour stomach, belching, distress after eating, heartburn or any other stomach trouble due to hyperacidity (the usual cause of stomach troubles), you should take no medicine to act upon the stomach itself. That is positively not the way to cure the trouble. Again, you should not half starve yourself by going without the nutritious food that you need to rebuild waste tissues. Some foods are not good for people even when in perfect health—very rich, sweet, highly seasoned dishes. Avoid these, but eatifairly substantial meals of plain foods. Drink before and after eating, but water, you should not drink with meals. Drink before and after eating simple instructions it is probable that you will not need any medicine at all except, if you want to call it medicine, a little antacid after meals. The best antacid is ordinary bisurated magnesia, which can be purchased at any drug as tore. This is not to act upon the stomach, have the contents of the stomach, and the contents of the stomach, and the contents of the stomach, and the contents of the stomach, the contents of the stomach is merely to neutralize or counteract the excess acid so the stomach can digest the food normally. Take a teaspoonful of bisurated magnesia in a little cold or hot water after each meal. You should get immediate relief, even if your case is severe. Careful, moderate eating and the use of bisurated magnesia should put your stomach in normal condition in a short time, if you have not allowed dyspepsia to advance to the extreme stage of developing stomach ulcers.

understanding of humanity, and thruit we had the most profound influence on the life and character of others. The word love ought to be the most sacred word in the language, yet one could never use it in a public address without provoking a smile. The conduct, often degenerating to the vulgarest horseplay, on the occasion of the average weddings, showed the usual attitude towards this problem of the personal relations. This, he believed, was the result of the old ascetic belief about the sacred relationship of the family life.

In our modern world we have a great deal of society and comparatively little friendship. In the old Greek society, where the wife was only the chief slave, the friendship of man with man was characteristic.

The Iliad depended on the friendship of the Achilles and Patrocius. In the rennaissance period in Italy and the Elizabethan age in England, in the Vistorian epoch, as in Tennyson's "In Memoriam," there appeared the same vitality of friendship. The absence of great friendships today was due to the lack of personal moral reality or sincerity. If this condition were fulfilled there had also to be either a likeness or identity of interests and personality, or an absolute difference of taste and interest. The more unlike men were the more they had to give each other. Goethe and Schiller were described as examples of this existence of common interests with the difference of personality.

Community of experience was another factor in friendship, It was also subject to the inexorable law of growth. But one had to win the love of one's friend every day over again to keep the love of yesterday. It meant loyal, faithful recognition of every bond, and every element of hypocrisy or insincerity was fatal, because disloyal to the principle of friendship. Friendship whose basic elements had disappeared. There was nothing so foolish as to try to blow life into a dead fire. The effort would only cover one with ashes. To be deeply significant, a friendship must be on a basis of moral equality. No wonde which disparity of age, of intellect, of aspiration or other fundamental qualities were features. Nowhere was innocent mistake so easy as in this closest relation, and this was chiefly due to the conventional carelessness of public opinion, with its blindly wielded yard-stick. He did not argue for a lower, but for a higher public opinion, a discerning public opinion, which would recognize the difference between the self-indulgent and the pure-minded.

In conection with eugenic legislation the best that could be hoped for, Mr. Griggs thought, was to stop the reproduction of the hopelessly riseased, physically or morally. From a home which might be an ideal breeding stable there might come perfect physical organisms, but not necessarily spiritual men and women.

Courtesy was the atmosphere of personal life which, like distance on the granite rocks of far-off mountains, cast the blue beauty which covered the hardness.

On the question of sex education of the young, he asserted that a text-book in the hands of a teacher and instruction three times a week was not the way. The problem was infinitely difficult, but this was no reason why it should be neglected altogether.

Next week's lecture will be of "The Use of the Margin," the secret of work and play.

We trace the story of humanity in its pages from ancient Egypt to modern Mexico. The style is clear, concise and vigorous and the interest is not allowed to flag. From one event we are led to another in logical sequence. In this way facts are not isolated entities, but each stands out, as an integral part of the vast scheme of human development. As a means of grasping and understanding the march of mankind from primitive savagery to the ethical ideals of the 20th century, the work is unequaled.
