The Duke and the Commoner.

By MRS. POULTNEY BIGELOW,
Author of "Beautiful Mrs. Thorndyke," etc.

SYNOPSIS.

Mr. Silverthorne had been dead two years, when Mrs. Clippingdale (Mr. Silverthorne's sister) is calling to see Mrs. Silverthorne (informed her that Mrs. Ronald Wood had been sounding her as to whether she would consent to meet the Duke of Assingdon at dinner. "I don't care any thing for dukes, but you may tell Mrs. Wood I shall be pleased to go. Mrs. Silverthorne was a bright and pretty young widow, and on this occasion looked remarkably charming. On this occasion Mrs. Silverthorne made so favorable an impression on the Duke of Assingdon. Helen (Mrs. Silverthorne) had accepted his hand in marriage, and returned to her home, till at last he informed her of the deep love he entertained towards her and wished for her consent to marriage. Helen declined, on the proposal, saying she "did not love him" therefore did not wish to marry. The Duke with these feelings of a rejected lover, felt a trip West for a month would either help him to forget her, or cause her to look on his proposal with less repugnance. Helen knew not, what the man to whom she had loved for years "Victor Pistorius". Feeling downhearted she resolved to take a trip to her sister-in-law's in Boston. While there on reading the papers one day, she saw the account of Victor Pistorius' marriage lately in Paris. On one more deep-rooted hope was torn up, one more illusion was gone. Next afternoon Mr. Clippingdale met the duke, he invited him to dine that evening, which he gladly accepted. Helen and he met again. He had heard she was in Boston and resolved to see her once more again before leaving. He again wished her consent to marriage, saying "till tonight I did not know how much I loved you," Helen consented, and they were engaged.

"For two years I heard nothing. I did not even see your name in the papers. Frau von Vinkelberg—the woman who brought us together, God bless her! never writes to me, and she is never, as no doubt you know, in Berlin now. I had my career,—a small one, if you like, but still my all,—and I could not leave Germany. Besides, how could I know what reception awaited me? I could not think—could not dream—that you thought of me—— Ah, forgive me!" he cried, as she raised her hand to stop him. "You do not know the meaning of two years devoid of hope. Do not stop me! It is only one moment of madness, only one, and then—a lifetime of sanity."

He was in the chair where Assingdon always sat; and his words, compared to Assingdon's, were like Vesuvius beside Mont Blanc.

As for Helen, the old charm was upon her. She listened, and knew that he was the only man who had power to sway her heart.

"If this be true, could you not have found me? One word,—one line—— Oh, no, no! I don't know what I'm saying," she cried, and covered her face with her hands.

He was silent, his faculties almost suspended. Before he found his voice or the words he wished to say, she had rallied, and looked up with a sudden calmness.

"Your wife, M. Pistorius,—is she with you?" she asked.

"My wife, Helen? Good God! I have no wife, nor ever shall have, now."

Helen rose, and as he too sprang to his feet she confronted him.

"You have no wife?" she said, very slowly. "You were not married in Paris a few week ago?"

"I was not, I swear to you! The idea is monstrous! You know that my life—my heart—are dedicated to the memory of you," he said, with intense feeling.

"And the man who was married,—Victor Pistorius—"

"Is my cousin."

"Ah!" She gave a long-drawn sigh, and her hands fell at her side.

"You doubted me? And you cared?" he asked.

"Say no more. It is too late."

"That I know," he said, sadly, with the fire gone from his eyes. "You are the wife of another man."

"Not yet," she murmured, "but it is too late."

"Not yet?" he cried. "What do you mean? Where is your husband?"

"He has been dead for two years," she said.

There was intense silence for a moment. They looked into each other's faces and were dumb.

"Dead two years; and you never told me!" Pistorius said at length. "I cannot understand it! You did not want me,—you doubted me,—while I—I have never married, never ceased to worship you since the day when you sent me away from you. To you it was an episode; to me, the history of my life,—for you were my life to me."

"I dared not send for you," she said, pleadingly. "How could I know that you felt this for me?"

"It was not that you doubted me," said Pistorius, with a touch of fierceness. "It was your own heart you doubted."

"Both," she said, humbly.

"And now," he went on, "you tell me it is too late. Why? Not unless you have given yourself to another. Not unless you were indifferent to me."

"Then you have not heard?" she said. Nothing. I have been on shore only three hours. What is it?"

"I am to be married in two weeks to the Duke of Assingdon."

She stood before him, deadly pale, her eyes cast down, her whole form shrinking as if from a blow.

Though he answered nothing at first, she dared not lift her eyes. When he did speak his tone had completely changed.

"I must, then, entreat your pardon, madam," he said with a sort of bitter gayety in his voice. "I know enough of his grace to speak with certainty. I wish you every happiness. You will excuse my mistake,—yes? and the duke need not know that, for the first time, we had a taste in common."

Helen winced.

"I said truly that I was mad—madder than I knew—when I was ready to offer you the heart and income of a beggarly secretary of legation! You must not blame me, for I was ignorant of the rank which so soon will be yours. My little apartement on the fifth story would be a poor substitute for Horbury Castle."

He turned away, and took up his hat and gloves.

Helen stood in his path, and forced him to face her.

"Stay a moment," she said, imperiously. "You have no right to insult me,—to hint that I am marrying the duke only for the sake of what he can give me. If you really love me as much as you say, do me justice, and take back that sneer at my future husband."

She hung her head as she said the last words.

His eyes were cold and steady now, and fixed on her face.

"If you can tell me that you love the duke," he said, "I will apologize in dust and ashes for what I have said. Only one word, and I ask your forgiveness."

He waited for a reply, but she was silent.

"Only a word," he repeated. "Tell me that you love the man Basil Sellon,—not the duke of Assingdon,—and I will be silent, and leave you to your happiness. If not——"

"If not?" she said.

"If not, I shall know that another has won from you what he with all his possessions could not,—your love. Yes! Do not contradict me! It is true; perhaps it was only for a day, a week,—a month at longest,—but there was a time when you loved me. You cannot deny it."

"You are very bold," she said, trying to feign anger to hide her craven trembling.

"Because I am desperate," he said, striving to preserve his composure.

"If you wish to be rid of me forever, tell me that you love the duke as you can love,—to the utmost,—and I will never trouble you again."

"What right have you——" she began, still trying to seem angry.

"None at all; but at least you know how to silence me. Will you say the words?"

She look at him with piteous eyes.

"I like him," she faltered; I admire him; I thought I should be happy with him,—as happy as one can be in this terrible world."

"You thought. But what do you think, now?" he persisted.

Helen sank down on a low chair near him, and her tears fell fast.

"Cruel!" she cried, in a muffled voice,—"cruel! If you really loved me you would not torture me,"

"Torture?" he cried. "What are you doing with me? Do you think I also am not weeping in my heart?"

He stooped over her and laid his hand lightly over hers.

"Forgive me," he said, very gently. "It is better as it is, perhaps,—better at least for you. Nine women out of ten would have chosen as you have done."

"There was no choice," she sobbed. "Would you have had me waitfor a word from you, to live on a memory till all hope of happiness was over?"

"You are right," he said, gravely. "It was too much to expect. I shall not add anything to your present trouble."

He once more turned as if to go.

Helen looked up, pale and tear-stained.

"What do you know of the duke?" she asked, faintly, like a tired child.

"Not much; only what every one knows,—perhaps you as well."

"Do you know him personally?"

"Very slightly."

"You did not like him?"

"I had no feelings either way for him.

"He is not a bad man?

"I do not know what your standard of goodness is. He was like most other men,—goodand bad mixed."

"I have seen nothing in him which is not good," said Helen.

"That is well. I hope he will make you very happy. When is the wedding to take place?"

"On the 31st. The duke is away at present,—in Canada."

She spoke more easily now, and Pistorius's usual manner had returned to him. But for Helen's distressed expression and the traces of tears round her eyes, there was nothing about either of them to hint that there had been a scene.

"I shall be going to Washington in a day or two, and you to England, I suppose. We probably shall not meet again," said the Dutchman.

"I wish you success,—and happiness," she said, in a low voice.

"Thank you," he said, dryly. "The one, no doubt,will bring the other. And you—you will have everything which a woman likes most. I hope the new life will be satisfying."

He bowed, and, without offering her his hand, left the room.

CHAPTER XII.

HELEN was dazed.

The thing which had been least likely to happen had happened,—which is a way things have.

Nothing was clear to her, for her mind was to numb still to grasp the situation,—like a frozen hand which can hold nothing.

Violet Clippingdale entered the room a quarter of an hour before the dinner-time, and found her still in her walking-dress, beside the fire.

"Has your visitor been gone long?" she asked. "I did not hear the door shut, so the children did not come down."

Helen looked at her with curiously blank eyes:

"He has been gone some time, I think. I don't know. I kept no track of the time."

She brushed her hair off her forehead and passed her hand over her eyes, with the gesture of a very weary person.

"You look very tired," said Violet. "Are you going to dress after dinner?"

"Dress? What for?" asked Helen, still blankly.

"Why" for the opera, of course! What's the matter? Have you been asleep?" asked Violet, noticing something unusual in her sister's manner.

"No, but It hink, I should like to sleep," said Helen.

"You can dress after dinner; but don,t give up the opera, our last one together for many a long day," said Mrs Clippingdale, settling her glistening robes about her, as she leaned back in the duke's favorite chair.

Helen rose languidly, and moved towards the door.

Violet stooped to pick up a card which lay at her feet. She read the name on it, and her composure vanished.

"Victor Pistorius!" she cried, starting up. "What does this mean

"Everything,—or nothing. I don't know," said Helen.

"What is that man doing here,Helen?"

"On his way to Washington."

"With his wife?"

"He has no wife."

"No wife? Then that paragraph in Galignani was a mistake?

"Yes."

"Oh, Helen! It is my fault."

She tried to take her sister in her arms. Helen motioned her gently away.

"I can't talk now. Some other time." She passed out of the room, and left Violet in an agony of selfreproach, and also of unsatisfied curiosity, which is almost as bad.

For a half-hour she and Horace, who presently entered, were deep in consultation and discussion, and at the end of that time Mrs. Silverthorne returned dressed for the opera.

Such was the awe that her looks inspired that neither of the Clippingdales dared to question her.

Substantial Proof for the Doubting and Unbelieving!
HOPE HAD ALMOST FLED!
A Friend's Golden Advice Gives a New Existence!

From a private letter received from a lady residing in the flourishing city of St. Thomas, Ont., we make public the following paragraph:—"You may say to the extremely nervous, who think their condition hopeless, that Paine's Celery Compound has done a wonderful work for me. For many years the twitching of the muscles of my face and eyes were truly terrible; my hands shook, and my limbs trembled. I was so afflicted that for nearly two years I have been unable to appear on the street. The use of your Paine's Celery Compound has completely restored me to health and strength, and my condition has never been better. I will do what I can to make your priceless remedy known to my friends, because it has taken from me a heavy and awful burden. It was recommended to me by a dear friend who had used it with entire satisfaction."

This is by no means an insolated case. Proofs come in continually of wonderful cures wrought by Paine's Celery Compound. Doctors in every part of Canada know well how it cures, and prescribe it with confidence for all forms of nervousness. We say to our nervous, weak, broken down and dyspeptic readers, try its effects and you will never regret the cost.

Only the best and largest oysters should be chosen for frying. Dip them, one by one, in flour, then in beaten egg, season with salt and the merest dash of cayenne, dip again in powdered butter cracker and fry them in boiling hot fat deep enough to float a doughnut. Turn them in frying and cook them in all for four minutes. Drain them thoroughly, lay them for a moment on coarse brown paper to absorb any fat that may cling to them, and serve them at once in a folded napkin on a hot dish accompanied by quarters of lemon and wafer-like slices of brown bread dantily buttered.

Wonderful Strength of Fleas.
Fleas are possessed of great strength says the St. Louis Republic. Mouffet tells of a mechanic who made a gold chain five inches in length which a pot flea could easily drag about on any smooth surface. Bigley writes of a watchmaker on the Strand, London, who had an ivory four-wheeled chariot with a coachman on its box, all of which was drawn around with ease by his trained flea, Dick. The same man afterward made a carriage, with six horses a coachman, four persons inside two footmen behind, and a postilion on one of the horses, all drawn by a single flea.

Latriella mentions a flea which dragged a silver cannon of 24 times its own weight, and showed no fear when the tiny piece was charged with gunpowder and fired off. Rene also says that he once saw three fleas drag an omnibus, a pair dragging a chariot, and a single one pulling a brass cannon mounted on wheels.

Nature provides a remedy for all ills, and Dr. Williams' Pink Pills is nature's remedy for the ills peculiar to the female system. Sleeplessness, weakness, nervousness and all diseases resulting from impoverished blood, speedily yield to this treatment. The young man who knows it all in the way of what should and what should not be worn, scarcely needs to be told that in London mauve is the prevailing color for ties, and that they are worn, if possible, larger than ever.

It is welcomed in every house in France and England, and in a very brief time the same can be said of Canada, from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Lesstive Phenix requires only to be tried once to be gratefully appreciated. A marvellous washing and cleansing solutive. Just fancy an article that will make all your clothes as good as new, and that will clean everything in the house from the silver that you cherish, to the common earthenware which you thought of throwing out making it just like new. That is what Lessive Phenix will do, and a score of other things. For it will clean everything, and it will not harden your hands.

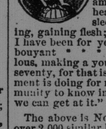
I FEEL BUOYANT



"Am happy to say that results so far are as satisfactory as I could expect, indeed much more so than I did expect. I am enjoying excellent health, appetite good, sleep sweet and refreshing, gaining flesh; am less nervous than I have been for years; feel bright and bouyant * * * It is almost miraculous, making a young man out of one of seventy, for that is just what your treatment is doing for me. I wish the community to know in as modest a way as we can get at it."
