The place was in one of the mountainous counties of Virginia, fifteen miles from an east and west railway line. Armitage opened a duly recorded deed which conveyed to himself the title to 2,000 acres of land; also a curiously complicated abstract of title showing the successive transfers of ownership from colonial days down through the years of Virginia's spiender to the dread time when battle shook the world. The title had passed from the receiver of a defunct shooting club to Armitaga, who had been charmed by the description of the property as set forth in an advertisement and lured, moreover, by the amaxingly small price at which the preceive was offered.
