Thunder and Lightning in Halifax.

The storm in Halifax on Tuesday even ing commenced leisurely enough. The heat was oppressive during the afternoon; after three, great masses of clouds gathered threatening rain, but still the watery element held back. At five there was a pattering of rain. Then hail fell furiously pattering of rain. Then hail fell furiously—such a storm of boil is some can remember to have before been witnessed in this oity. The hail stones fell thick and fast, and in sizes varying from a pea to a marble, for five or ten minutes they continued to fall After the hail, rain lell in torrents for about half an hour, deluging the streets. About five o'clock the city was startled by a flash of lightning so vivid that it seemed to have entered every house, and a peal of the we entered every house, and a peal of the we entered every house, and a peal of the we entered every house, and a peal of the we entered every house, and a peal of the we entered every house, and a peal of the we entered every house, and a peal of the we entered every house, and a peal of the we entered every house, and a peal of the we entered every house, and a peal of the we entered every house, and a peal of the we entered every house, and a peal of the we entered every house, and a peal of the we have entered every house, and a peal of the we have entered every house, and a peal of the we have entered every house, and a peal of the we was another flash, more terribly vivid there was another flash, more terribly wivid the provious one was insignificant. Surely there was damage, if not death, in those terrible outbreaks of the elements! While the people were yet overcome with awe, the dread ory of "ker" was raised in the streets, and in a moment the bells rang out the alarm in startling tones. For a little while, comparatively few persons ventured on the streets, there seeming to be an indescribable feeting of alarm ameng all. The clang of the bells aroused the populace to the necessity of action, and soon crowds ran through the pleting rain to see the cause of the alarm and learn what damage, if any had been and long white baton uplaced the populace to the necessity of action, and soon crowds ran through the pleting rain to see the cause of the alarm and learn what damage, if any the pleting rain to see the cause of the alarm and learn w
