In the course of my public life, I have had occasion to make acknowledgment of many expressions of good-will on the part of friends both in and out of Parliament, from different parts of our own country, and from other countries than our own. I confess, however, that, on this occasion, I find it extremely difficult to know just what to say. Today's experience is a novel one. The last in the world that I could have imagined when I became a member of the Canadian House of Commons.
