IT SOON GREW DARK ENOUGH.

Yale Recorder. "You may not kiss me, Jack," said she, While dimples dotted saucily Her cheeks of blushing red; "You may not kiss me, Jack, until—"

But there (confound my luck) on high The sun amid the azure sky
Poured forth its goiden light,
But I—I wished each piercing ray
Would, fading ,put an end to day
And; hasten on the night.

From yonder west, where ocean rolls Her foaming waves on sandy shoals, A dark'ning storm cloud blew; The bright sun faded soon away. While biacker grew the antumn day Still there I sat with Sue.

Alas! I knew the storm full well Would drive us from the cosy dell Where oft the hours we whiled; But Sue, she sighed and bent her head Then looking up, "Why, Jack," she

A Famous Comhat That Had Deadly Re-ults.

But the Famous Daniel. Never go Over Pegretting His Deed.

The story of an Irish political duel is told by Michael MaqDonagh in the Cornhill Magazine.

On January 22, 1815, at a meeting of the newly framed Catholic association, Daniel O'Connell urged the necessity of infusing fresh life and energy into the movement for Catholic emancipation. No petition, as he pointed out, had been presented to parliament the previous year. "I am conment the previous year. "I am convinced," said he, "that the Catholic cause has suffered by neglect of discussion. Had the petition been, last year, the subject of debate, we should not now see the beggarly corporation of Dublin anticipating our efforts by a petition of an opposite tendency." The speech was reported in the newspapers the next day, and J. N. D'Esterre, a member of the corporation, sent O'Connell a letter demand. tion, sent O'Connell a letter demand-ing retraction. The latter refused to either admit or disclaim the expression respecting the corporation, and D'es-terre then widely proclaimed that he was going to horsewhip O'Connell pub-licly. Clansmen of both parties gath-ered, ready for a general row, but D'Esterre did not attempt to make his threat good. However, he challenged O'Connell to a duel, and on February D'Esterre and O'Connell stood face teen miles from Dublin.

O'Connell, for a portion of the time the seconds were arranging matters, walked up and down at the end of the field near the road wall, closely wrapped in his great cloak, apparently engaged in prayer. The position was all the more trying to him as a devout Catholic, for he knew that, by a de-cree of the council of Trent, Catholics who took part in a duel were excommunicated. Therefore, none of the clergy of Dublin could accompany him to administer the last rites of the church should he be fatally wounded; but in a cabin hard by there was a suspended priest, named Father O'Mullane, prepared to give him absolution in articulo mortis, if necessary. These thoughts had for a moment a depressing effect on O'Connell, but shaking them off he joined his friends and recognizing in the throng Jerry MacCarthy, a well known Dublin tailor, he exclaimed in his wonted exuberance of spirits, "Ah, Jerry, I never missed you from an aggregate meeting." Seeing Charles Phillips, a well known Irish barrister, and author of "Curran and His Contemporaries," in the crowd he called him aside and said, "Phillips, this seems to me not a personal but a political affair. I am obnoxious to a party and they adopt a false pretense to cut me off. They have reckoned without their host, I promise you. I am one of the best shots in Ireland at a mark, having as a public man considered it my duty to prepare for my own protection against such unprovoked aggression as the pressing effect on O'Connell, but shaksuch unprovoked aggression as the present. Now remember what I say to you. I may be struck myself, and then skill is out of the question; but if I am not, my antagonist will have cause to regret having forced me into this conflict.' As O'Conneil flung off his coat before repairing to his position, his sec-ond carefully looked him over and, noticing that he wore a white muslin cravat, and that a large bunch of seals hung from his fob, he removed, remarking that such conspicuous objects wou d regulate the aim of D'Esterre. The latter displayed the same cool indifference H: was observed twirling his right leg around a cane resting on the ground, and chatting unconcernedly to his friends. When he appeared in his place he declared that whatever might be the result of this unpleasant business between himself and O'Connell, it did not originate self and O'Connell, it did not originate on his part from any religious animosity or party feeling. From the bottom of his heart he could say—and he appealed to God to witness the truth of his words—he harbored no ilfeelings against his Catholic fellow-countryman.

The combatants were placed facing each other, ten paces apart, with a pistol in each hand, the directions being that when the signal was given they might fire whenever they pleased, advancing or retiring before or after fire as they thought proper. After the signal both men stood with weapons down for a few seconds, closely pons down for a few seconds, closely watching each other. Then D'Esterre manoeuvering apparently to confuse O'Connell and make him fire at random-moved a pace to the left, took a step forward, and raised his pistol, as if to fire. But O'Connell, who stood still on the alert, anticipated him Quick as lightning he lifted who stood still on the alert, anticipated him. Quick as lightning he lifted his weapon, aimed low, and fired. About the same moment D'Esterre's weapon exp'oded—the bullet truck the ground at O'Conneil's feet—and the unfortunate man staggered, then fell heavily forward, amid the wild exulting sharts of the stage of t Now is the Time to Subscribe Both the surgeons hastened to him. The bail had traversed the hip and to could not be found; but thought D'Esterre was bleeding profusely, no one suspected that he had received his death-wound. In fact, Major Mac-Namara shook Sir Edward Stanley by the hand, warmly congratulating him that the duci had ended without loss of life.

The popular excitement in Dublin when the result became known was tremendous. Bonfires blazed till midtremendous. Bonfires blazed till midnight in the streets, which swarmed with crowds shouting in joy for the safe return of their favorite. Next day 700 gentlemen left their cards at O'Connell's residence. Meanwhile, D'Esterre was slowly bleeding to death in his house at Bachelor's Walk. The end came on the afternoon of Friday, the second day after the duel. Before his death the unhappy man made a declaration that he alone was responsible for his death, that O'Con-

made a declaration that he alone was responsible for his death, that O'Connell was blameless in the matter, a she himself had provoked the duel.

So ended an 'event memorable in the yaried vicissitudes of O'Connell's career. He was at heart the kindest and most goodnatured of men; he was also of a deeply religious nature, and he had a genuine horror of bloodshed. The death of D'Esterre therefore filled him with remorse. He publicly declared shortly afterwards that he had made a vow never again to send or to had made a vow never again to send or to receive a challenge to a duel If, on his way to or from the Four Courts, he went by Bachelor's Walk, he always lifted his hat in i murmured a prayer for his adver-sary's soul, or for his own forgiveness, on sing the house in which D'Esterre died. In late years he went to the extent of wearing a black glove always on his right had as a token of his mourning for having killed D'Esterre. But the effect of the duel on O'Connell's fortunes as an agitator was immense. On that day he became known and loved throughout the length and breadth of Ireland—on that day dated his power and influence as the tribune of the Irish people.

Por fifteen years I suffered untold misery. I had given up all hope of ever getting well. I could not lie down to sleep, and everything I ate would almost cramp me to death. Was very nervous and could hardly welk across the room. I only weighed ninety pounds when I commenced talking these medicines six years ago; I now weigh one, hundred and forty pounds and am having better health than ever before. Why Not Home Made Ice.

If the courts fail, science may be de pended upon to knock out the ice trust says a chemist in the Kansas City Star. "I venture the prediction that the average well to do family will be making its own ice inside the next two years. For a long time past a number of the cleverest inventors in the country have been trying to devise a small, compact ice machine, with a capacity of from 50 to 500 pounds a day, that can be operated by any domestic servant, and they have made sufficient progress to bring success clearly in view. It is an interesting fact that nearly all the remarkable improvements which have been made in large commercial machines during the last two or three years have suggested themselves in this tireless search for a practical household apparatus

"When I say that success is in sight, I mean that all the most serious problems have been solved, and the difficulties that remain to be overcome are purely mechanical. As a matter of four or five small machines are already in the market, but none of them quite meets the requirements. The ideal apparatus for use in cities will probably obtain its power from an incandescent lamp socket, just like the ordinary electric fan. The cook will fill up the receiver with water make the connection and go about her business.

There is nothing Utopian about this little forcast. Private ice plants are already practical for very small commercial concerns-resturants, confectioners, etc.-and the household machine is one of the advances along the line or domestic economy to which we may look forward with absolute confidence By the by, one of the inventors who is pegging away at the problem is a New Orleans man, and I was told lately that he had turned out a very suc cessful working model. I have said nothing about liquid air, because that strange product has proven so tricky and intractable that it is risky to venture any predictions as to what may or may not be done with it.
