with the message that she was forgiven and to come home.

Poor Kittie was mortified enough, but when she arrived home, and the guests made more of a heroine of her than circumstances deserved, and she found the deacon didn't look a bit angry, and her mother never said one reproving word, and caught the minister's eye full of laughter and of something else Kittie couldn't understand, her mortification took flight.

And that evening walking home from church, the few words the minister spoke made her happier than she ever had been before; but the words were not of the sermon, and, a little while after, when the deacon gave them his blessing, he added with sadness and mirthfulness mingled:

'She will make you a good wife, parson, but will never be as economical as her mother as I said once before.'

Mrs. Stanley ever blessed Kittie's joke, for afterward the deacon was never fond of many patches.
