"He said I wasn't changed," she began, passionately. "I should think he'd find it written all over my face. I tried to stem the current with his unavailing kindness."

"Margaret, you did it for your mother," he said.

"Yes, I did it for my mother. For myself, too. I was lonesome. I had to talk about him. I had to write those letters. Now he's come back, and I'm a liar, and he's got to know it."

"Then she was silent, waiting, and he waited with her. After a long time there was the interchange of quick speech without, and the two men walked in. Doctor Winter's eyes were shining. He came straight to her and took her hands.

"Margaret," said he, "good news! She forgot her own miserable anti-cipation," and seemed to have given her hands a little shake, recalling her.

"Can you do something for her?" she asked then her face quivering.

"Something can be done," said Raymond, gently, from the other side. "A great deal really."

"Is that true?" She turned from one to the other.

"So say we both of us," Winter assured her. Then he pulled out his watch. "Doctor," said he, "you've just eleven minutes to catch the train."

"Hang the train!"

"Just as you say. See you at the hospital."

"Tomorrow."

The doctor paused. "Missy," said he, "suppose I carry Major Wilkes off to luncheon. Return him this afternoon in good position. You seem to have a lien on him."

"I should think so!" She laid a hand on her old friend's arm, afraid to let him go, and yet knowing her crisis must be met alone. "Why, he's my godfather!"

"Yes, my dear," said the Major. He was breathing for new news. At Raymond had persuaded him to govern his own affairs, and yet knowing her crisis must be met alone. "Why, he's my godfather!"

"You renounced all sorts of things for me," she reminded him with one of her wilful little smiles, and Telloe held the Major's coat, murmured, absentmindedly.

"The devil and all his works."

"I'll renounce 'em again any day," said the Major, bluffly and with meaning. "I'm ready, Winter. Then they were gone, and Missy turned to Raymond. Her little beauty came back. At once she had the glow lent by the presence of the well-beloved.

"You'll lose your train," she said, because it was for the moment impossible to touch on the deep things between them.

He came nearer, his eyes dwelling upon her with a look she remembered from their younger days.

"Do you know where you're going?" he asked. "Down to Haviland to find you."

"We don't live there now." This was what he ignored, but she said, "It's like a great big dream, Missy, the kind I used to have over there in Germany after you gave me up. I used to dream he'd come back and everything was just the same, and then I'd wake up. He stopped and looked at her impatiently. We can't talk about that. But here I am, and you're not married, and your mother has kissed me and called me her son."

"Not not!" cried Missy. "You mustn't think of anything she says. And I'm not the same. I'm—"

There had been a long presence about the room, and now they were aware of Telloe by the door, his dignity laid aside, lost in a wild signal.

"Missy," said he, "might I speak to you?"

"Does mother want me?" with these words she was beside him, but Telloe put out one hand and detained her as if she were still the child he had loved and tended.

"No, Missy, no. But I've got to speak to you. Missy, you've been through enough. Don't you go and upset everything. Now folks have come back ready to eat the ground you tread on."

"But I'm a liar, Telloe!" She was looking at him in quiet sadness, and he twisted his hands miserably.

"Yes, Missy, yes," he said. "You are."

"Wouldn't you like to hear me tell the truth?"

"No, Missy, not when there's so much depending on it. If I might make so free as to ask you, sir," said Telloe, "you bein' a doctor, in case there was anything that would trouble a man's mind, if I've had a better keep it out of sight?"

Raymond turned on him his quick probing glance.

"By all means," he answered. "Any particular thing?"

"No sir," said Telloe, his old head more and more abashed. "Everything in general, sir. And if a nice soft-spoken he would keep her goin', I make no doubt, sir, as a doctor, you'd hold with cookin' things up a trifle."

"I might."

Telloe raised his head.

"There, Missy," he croaked triumphantly. "Thank you, sir. About this lyin' business, sir, it's this. I've made bold to lie like smoke to old madam these last five years. It's troubled Missy mortal bad. Telloe, says she to me, 'wherever will you go?' To hell, Missy, says I, and serve me right. He included Missy in the cock of his eye, and spoke with a significance for her alone. "Not that I'm so sure of it, sir. Sometimes I think we get all the punishment we deserve, and get it here below."

Missy interposed. She laughed a little, but her eyes were wet.

"That'll do, Telloe. You might go now."

"Yes, Missy," said Telloe, absorb-
