

BEYOND.
Beyond life's toils and cares,
Its hopes and joys, its weariness and sorrow,
Its sleepless nights, its days of smiles and tears,
Will be a lone sweet life, unmarked by years,
—One bright unending morn'g!
Beyond time's troubled stream,
Beyond the chilling waves of death's dark river,
Beyond life's lowering clouds and fitful gleams
Its dark realities and brighter dreams,
A beautiful forever.
No aching hearts are there;
No tear-dimmed eye, no form by sickness wasted,
No cheek grown pale through penury or care,
No spirit crushed beneath the woes they bear,
No sighs for bliss unmet.
No sad farewell is heard,
No lonely wail for loving ones departed,
No dark remorse is there or memories stirred,
No smug of scorn, no harsh or cruel word
To grieve the broken-hearted.
No long dark night is there,
No light from sun or silvery moon is given,
But Christ, the Lamb of God, all bright and fair,
Illumes the city with effulgence rare,
The glories light of heaven!
No mortal eye hath seen
The glories of that land beyond the river,
Its crystal lakes, its fields of living green,
Its fadeless flowers and the unchanging sheen
Around the Throne forever.
Ear hath not heard the songs
Of rapturous praise within that shining portal,
No heart of man hath dreamt what bliss
Belongs
To that redeemed and joyous blood-washed throng,
All glorious and immortal.

A TALE OF THE CLYDE.
CHAPTER XXIII.
The "Half Moon" was found without difficulty; and in answer to their inquiries, the landlord—a thickset, low-browed fellow, evidently of prize-winning connection—told them that Mangles still lived, and would be found in a lodging house in Ridley's Court.

"There's half-a-crown to the messenger that will go and fetch him," said Edwin.
"Bless yer, sir," returned the landlord, "he couldn't come—not if you was to give him five pounds. He hasn't been able to stir out for the last two months, all along of the want of power in the limbs. All that he's good for now is to curse and swear at his ill luck, which, I may tell you, gents, he does uncommon strong, as I heard him myself last time I took along the tip."

"The tip?" repeated Edwin, interrogatively.
"That's the tin as was raised last time the Half Moon gave him a benefit. Bless yer art, sir, if we and one or two more 'ouses ain't do summat for him now and then, he would starve outright."

"Ah, I see, you make occasional contributions for his subsistence."
"It don't do more nor keep soul and body together, sir; and these many part companies for all the good he's fit for now, for Dicky Mangles will never touch one or strike ball again, or even put chalk to blackboard. But, you see, sir, life's life, and we all want to keep it in so long as the tack can be got to hold. Now, if you gents mean to befriend Dicky, you haven't come a moment too soon."

"Is his mind much shattered?" asked Weggie.
"Has he lost his memory?"
"Not a bit on it, sir. It's his limbs wot has failed; and when he ain't drunk—as isn't often the case now, seeing he has got no money to do it on—he's about as sharp as ever he was."

"Very good. Now, how shall we find the house where he lodges?"
"Nothing easier, sir. When you go into Ridley's Court, which is on the other side, and not more nor two hundred yards along from this, all you've got to do is to ask for Mother M'Geen's lodging-house, and the first person you meet will show you."
Ridley's Court proved to be a dark, dirty, narrow alley, composed of the most wretched class of houses, and occupied by an equally wretched class of people if any judgment of the fact could be formed from the sight of gaunt, hungry faces, and filthy ragged forms which lay in the doorways or rolled in the gutter. The stopping of a cab at such a place, and the entrance of four well-dressed men, caused no little stir, and an excitement of curiosity which was not allayed when the strangers asked for Mother M'Geen's lodging-house. Two or three hands, however, were raised at once to point to a house in the corner, by the upper portion of which. It was said, was the lodging-house in question; and down the dingy, filthy alley they went, and up the creaking wooden stair, at the top of which was an open door, and beyond a passage black with smoke and murky darkness.

Assembled in a body on the unstable landing-place, which shook alarmingly under the Squire's weighty frame, the latter—who, as an old acquaintance of the man they had come to see, was to open the negotiations—knocked loudly with his large thorn stick on the dingy door, and thereby produced a sound which went echoing forward, and was speedily followed by the opening of an inner door and the appearance of a little, old, saw-toothed woman, looming out of the darkness as she drew near.

"Are you Mother M'Geen?" he asked, in his loud, hearty manner.
"Oh, shure, and I'm all you'll get for her, sir," was the answer in a strong Irish brogue.
"Have you a lodger called Mangles?"
"Indade and I have, sir, and more's the pity for any help he gives me to pay the rent."

"He is within now, I presume?"
"Did you say within, sir? Shure, then, he hasn't been without for the best end of a year."
"Well, we wish to see him, if you will show us to where he is."
"It's meself will do that same if yer honours doesn't mind the poorness of the place. All the boys are out but himself, so you won't be troubled wid their company. This way, if ye please, and be afther mindin' the step—oh, holy mother, I'm killt entirely!"

This latter horrified exclamation was preceded by a noisy clatter, and the falling forward of the bulky-bodied Squire down the step, of whose existence she was about to give warning—too late, however, to prevent the catastrophe, for while she was about to say "step," the Squire had reached it, and ignorant of such a sudden change in the level of the passage, he stumbled forward against the woman with a force which caused both to lose their equilibrium, and, coming to the ground, the Squire fell on the top of Mother M'Geen with crushing effect.
