London, Sept. 30 .- The Grand Trunk report, to be published tomorrow, contains a significant foot note, as fol-lows: "The directors take this opportunity of impressing upon the pro-prietors that progress shown for some time past in the company's revenue has largely resulted from expenditure incurred for affording increased traffic facilities by the gradual construction of bridges in heavier materials, by double-tracking, reducing gradient portions of the lines, by increasing the haulage power and engines, and the carrying capacity of freight cars. They are convinced it is only by continuing this policy that the measure of improvement, already attained, can be maintained or augmented. counts show an outlay of £55,540 on capital account on new works and double tracking. The gross receipts increased 6.92 per cent for the half year. The working expenses increased 7.07 per cent. The train mileage decreased 1.66 per cent.

his cross-examination, Witness said that the injuries to a skull with a body falling 24 feet and alighting on a brick would depend altogether on the angle of the brick. The periosteum would not necessarily be broken, nor would witness expect the skull to be broken in. The fact that there no detachment of the periosteum from the scalp led witness to believe that the injuries were not caused by a succession of blows. The emphysema found at the post-mortem was not necessarily due either to injury of the scalp, or the abrasions behind the ear. The rupture of the muscle of the neck might be caused by a blow, which might or might not leave a mark. Witness thought that the fracture and the wound were produced by one blow. MR. RIDDELL'S DESIRE.

The fractures, he said, could only be due to forces produced by two different impacts, occurring simultaneously. Taking Herbert's story, there would be blood all over the place where the wounds were sustained. With body carried across a mow and thrown out across a beam, witness said he would be able to trace the course taken.
