Sixth Regiment D. O. C. Rifles Falls in Attempt to Capture City.

Landed at Oak Bay to Invade Victoria But Were Driven Back.

Interesting Mobilization Manoeuvres Add to Training of Militiamen.

IN the early morn, when a leaden sky drizzled intermittently, an enemy was reported. The Fifth Regiment, C. A., had expected to hear of this enemy and an attack developed which soon assumed the proportions of a battle covering a large territory. The Sixth Regiment, D. O. C. Rifles, of Vancouver and New Westminster, 450 strong, reinforced by a party of 100 men landed in the neighborhood of Oak Bay encamped at the Agricultural hall, and invested the area between that place and the Sixth Regiment, C. A., under Lieut.-Col. Hall, left the Drill hall at 9:30 a. m., and a company of Royal Engineers under Captain Williams left Work Point to reinforce them. Two 13-pounders which were in use were also sent. Plans were hurried to Beacon Hill and rushed up and unlimbered in a position marked by a cover near the Burns monument. In the meantime a fringe of scouts under Capt. Ryan had been sent out and a defensive position taken up along the Cook street line. Surely the party were put out of action, had an unripe sense the melée. The enemy, however, believed that the R. E. fell back, except one belittled regular, and he rushed to the front with his carbine rifle. He did not strike, however, discarding his rifle in favor of his fists. He closed with the regular, and after a few minutes punching at each other, until an officer separated them and the warlike regular was taken prisoner.

The Battle Began

The scouts were quickly pushed forward and they took the territory beyond Marconi hill, also beyond the rocks, all clear. The scouts reached the line of St. Charles street without the loss of a man. The enemy, however, being taken at the residence of a commander, who had been taken and jumped from a window when capture was threatened. Capt. Langley was then ordered to occupy Marconi hill, where the wireless mast is located, in force. He did so, and the signaller promptly reported this. The guns had taken the front of this hill, also Government House and other emplacements, and the advance continued. The different sections of the army advanced quickly by telephone they seized whatever communication was near, and the signaller who came small-like with their messengers maintained communication between the staff and the front. Theoretically, the engineers cleared the country, cutting down trees and burning houses. But only in theory. Capt. Williams, with the force of Royal Engineers on the extreme left, was ordered to occupy and strengthen a position northward of Government House at 11:30 a. m., to come into touch with Nos. 5 and 6 companies and throw out the enemy to the east, but the orders didn't reach him, and he had gone forward on an independent advance through the lowlands by the had been sent with a message to him returned with the

Disconcerting News

That Capt. Williams had gone to Oak Bay. But, although the situation was for a time lost with this section, it was well maintained with the other units, and the general advance was maintained slowly and cautiously. The scouts, well in front, found the enemy in small strength on McNeill's hill. The force of the front, under the direction of the Sixth Rifles from the rocks, Capt. Williams and Winsby followed the preparatory fire of an infantry assault on Shotbolt's hill, but the enemy had already fallen back, and their main force was on the east. Capt. Langley, nearer the front, more advanced as rapidly, but No. 6 and the Engineers, on the left, had gone well forward under the direction of the Engineers by 3 o'clock. Sections of the force on the right moved toward the centre and succeeded in flanking a retiring force of No. 6 company, as score of men were taken. These men had been driven through a gorge with a and the tail-enders were caught by the advancing Royal Engineers, one of whom, not satisfied with waiting for the surrender of the enemy, had fired in with his fists, but he soon remembered it was all "make believe." Many Amusing Incidents took place. Major Hibben was of the staff. The staff had advanced up Oak Bay avenue with its escort and the guns were moving into place on Foul Bay road. Major Hibben had a momentary spare and he was in conversation with some friends when the resident of the house on which he stood asked if he would hold a ladder while the householders secured a hive of bees. He did. Then he ran, but he had been warning about the bees. And if this report had not capped the field censor the public might never have known about it.

Slid Under His Bed

For a time they puzzled over the problem of the two men and three rifles. The rifles were in the room, the men sticking out from under the bed. He managed to jump through an open window and run, however. But the other two were captured. Some of the R. E. were firing from two sides, pouring a cross-fire into some members of the enemy. The R.
