

logical conditions by methods other than operative. At the same time the author has successfully presented very clearly the means that should be adopted in order to arrive at accurate diagnosis, and has been careful to enforce the necessity for employing operations where that is clearly the safest and best means of affording relief for his patient.

The work, which consists of some 700 pages, well illustrated, will be found of great use to the medical practitioner, who should be well informed as to the more modern methods of treating this class of disease, and he will find no treatise on the subject more complete and useful than the one at present under review.

W. B. Saunders' Company, the medical publishers, of Philadelphia and London, have just issued a new edition—the thirteenth—of their handsome Illustrated Catalogue. It contains some twenty new books and new editions, and besides numerous black-and-white illustrations, there are two color cuts of special value. We strongly advise every physician to obtain a copy—sent for the asking. It will prove a ready guide to good medical books—books that we all need in our daily work.

This little book may profitably find a niche in the office of the busy practitioner, and would give a student much useful help.

Doubtless, if talking things over with the author, one would find so many things in common that the few disagreements would hardly matter; but when a man states, in speaking of burns, "A bad burn gives rise to little or no pain, because the patient is in a condition of collapse," it leads one to believe that the author has been coddled and carefully nurtured as a
