

...the fact that the Government has not been able to secure the necessary amount of money to meet its obligations, and that it has been obliged to resort to the issue of new securities, is a serious matter, and one which should be met with the greatest care and consideration.

The Government has been obliged to issue new securities, and this has been done in a way which has not been usual in the past. It is a matter which has attracted much public attention, and it is one which should be met with the greatest care and consideration.

The Government has been obliged to issue new securities, and this has been done in a way which has not been usual in the past. It is a matter which has attracted much public attention, and it is one which should be met with the greatest care and consideration.

The Government has been obliged to issue new securities, and this has been done in a way which has not been usual in the past. It is a matter which has attracted much public attention, and it is one which should be met with the greatest care and consideration.

The Government has been obliged to issue new securities, and this has been done in a way which has not been usual in the past. It is a matter which has attracted much public attention, and it is one which should be met with the greatest care and consideration.