

may feel they are parts of the one Church, every parish interested not only in its own welfare and prosperity, but in that of the whole Island; and to evoke, if possible, a spirit of liberality, which is as yet, only struggling painfully into existence. And this mention of liberality leads me to remark that it is very necessary for the Church people of the whole Diocese to adopt the practice of regular and systematic giving—systematic in the sense of a definite proportion of a man's income being set aside for the sole purpose of benevolence, no man venturing to consider himself liberal, no matter how much he gives, until he has gone beyond the amount which he thus devoted to God; and regular, so that week by week the same amount is given, varied only in the direction of excess for some object in which he feels a peculiar interest. And this practice should be not only adopted by heads of families, but their children should be taught it, until the principle is established in their minds and they have learned to act upon it. I am sure that all persons, with only a very few exceptions, would be astonished, if they would scrupulously keep a record of their expenditure, to find how small and trifling a sum they give to God and His cause in the world,—altogether out of proportion to that which they spend upon themselves, and nowhere near the tithe which, given from time immemorial, was adopted into the Mosaic Code, and made a law for the people of God. Were only this tenth universally given, all sufficient funds would be provided for the work of the Church; Parochial, Diocesan, Domestic and Foreign: while the givers themselves would find giving a pleasure, and receive both temporal and spiritual blessings from Him “who giveth us richly all things to enjoy.”
