What She Wants.

And she wants to earn a living. She wants to be good. She wants to atone for the sorrow she has caused.

She can't work hard, she says, for she has never been used to it, and she understant the way she earns her living?

I know hundreds and hundreds of women—delicate, refined, lovely women—who work and work hard for a living, and they do it because they would rather die than ask anybody on earth for a penny so long as they can hold up their heads, and can earn that penny themselves.

They are just as fond of protty

They are just as fond of pretty clothes and rich food and motor rides and seats at the theatre as anybody; but they would not be the are as anybody; but they would rather go without these but they would rather go without these things than to earn them by the sale of their own self-respect.

Hard work, plain living, plain people, the facing of the unpleasant truth and facing it honestly—these are the things that this poor, foolish girl needs as she needs nothing else on earth.

She has done a great wrong, committed a grievous sin of cruel selfshness—no, there is no use of her sitting brooding over that, and there is no right or beauty in such a course of action.

The world is full of chances for honest, hard work—wages are high, situations are comparatively easy to get.
