Giving Things A Rest

By RUTH CAMERON

As long as possible and remain in the most efficient state, human beings must have a certain amount of rest and change. That is a truism. But did it ever occur to you that inanimate objects also seem to profit by an occasional rest?

A few months ago, a clock which we had had a great many years, suddenly stopped in the middle of the week, and firmly resisted all efforts to start it. "It needs cleaning," we said, "we must send it to the clockmaker." We were very busy, however, and put off attending to this matter until last week. At that time we were about to call up the clockmaker and ask him to come for the recalcitrant time-piece, when someone suggested, "Let's try to start it once more before we send it away." We did so and the clock started cheerily off on its duties of time-keeping without a murmur or a hitch. All it needed, you see, was a rest.

Everyone knows that boots and shoes will wear just about twice as long if they are not worn steadily, but given a chance to rest a day or two every now and then, and many people say the same about clothes. At the end of last summer, the hat which I had worn all the season seemed absolutely impossible to me, and I bought my winter hat considerably earlier than I had intended to, because it did not seem to me that I could wear my faded and dilapidated summer hat even once more. But behold, when I took that hat out of the wardrobe after a winter's rest, it didn't look half bad, and I actually wore it a few times.

A woman who keeps two or three expensive plumes as permanent hat ornaments, declares that she is able to get a good deal more wear out of them, if she gives them a season's rest now and then. "If I used them steadily every season, they would only last three or four years," she says, "but by giving them a summer or a winter vacation now and then, I can keep them presentable for eight or nine years."

Perhaps someone will suggest in the case of the hat that the change was subjective rather than objective; in other words, that it was my eyes which profited by the rest rather than the hat. There may be something in that, but that hypothesis doesn't explain the clock, you know, nor the plumes, nor the shoes. There have been philosophers who contended that there is a principle of life in every inanimate object. I can't quite go that far, but I do still insist that, however you explain it, in this matter, inanimate objects are just like you and me—they sometimes need a rest.

Lord Devonport, Whom Ben Tillett Threatened to Shoot if Troops Were Called Out in London Strike—Royal Birthday Honors

(Copyright, 1912, by the Brentwood Co.)

Lord Devonport, the unpaid chairman of the board controlling the port of London, whom Ben Tillett, Dock and Transport Workers' strike-leader, has publicly threatened to shoot if the military are called upon to preserve order, is a self-made man, and the principal rival of Sir Thomas Lipton in the tea and grocery trade, as also in the tea-planting industry in Ceylon and Assam.

Hudson Kearley, by birth, he started life as a clerk, or rather as an office-boy, in a tea house in London, at the age of fifteen. When he was twenty he determined to begin business for himself as a tea merchant, and his firm, known now as Kearley & Sons, was thus begun, as a tea merchant, he acting as his own buyer, blender, traveller, and book-keeper.

Now he has establishments all over the world; in the United States, Europe, South America, Asia, Africa, and Australia, and is enormously rich.

Entering parliament for Devonport, in 1892, as a Liberal, he showed such a knowledge, acquired as a boy, of everything relating to life and work along the water front of London, that Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, then premier, made him a member of the administration, as minister of board of trade and entrusted him with the great task of carrying through parliament that arrangement whereby the London docks passed into the possession of the state.

Simultaneously he reorganized the entire management of the great port of London, which extends from London Bridge and even higher up the river—to Teddington Lock, a belief—down to the mouth of the Thames. For his services in this connection he received, in turn, a baronetcy, a seat in the king's privy council, and elevation to the upper house as Lord Devonport.

Parliament voted a salary of $20,000 a year for the office of president of the state board of control of the port of London, which he now holds; but as he refused all emolument, on the ground that to be permitted to serve the nation in so important a fashion is in itself a sufficient reward. He has a country seat at Marlow, in Buckinghamshire, and another near Denbigh, in Wales, is one of the pillars of the Reform Club in London, and also the first member of a great grocery firm to receive a peerage.

If Lord Carrick has received a barony of the united kingdom on the king's birthday, it is in order to provide for him a seat in the House of Lords, and to give the government an additional vote there. His peerages are all Irish. There are some 180 Irish peers, and they elect for life twenty-eight of their number to represent their order in the upper house of parliament at Westminster.

As an overwhelming majority of them are Unionists, no Liberal Irish peer stands any chance of election when a vacancy occurs. Lord Carrick is a Liberal, and what is more, a home ruler, who has rendered most useful service to the state as inspector of the agricultural and technical instruction department of Ireland, since his retirement from the army, his activities being directed towards promoting both the agricultural and the manufacturing industries of the Emerald Isle.

A few years ago, prior to his accession to the earldom, he figured as an expert witness in an important lawsuit in Dublin, in connection with the Irish linen trade, and was able to give much technical information to the court in regard to the production of the fabric from the raw material.

About two years ago he secured the conviction in the Central Criminal Court, London, of a big firm which made a practice of selling, in their various stores, handkerchiefs and similar articles made of a mixture of linen and cotton, which they described as Irish linen.

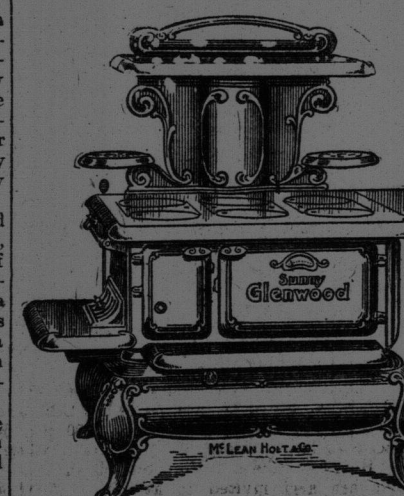

In the course of his duties as inspector of Irish dairy produce in England, he resorted to many odd expedients to satisfy his curiosity; for instance, dressing himself as a laborer, in order to purchase samples of butter that was being sold to the poor as the product of Irish dairies, a plan that was extremely successful.

Another noteworthy royal birthday honor, is that conferred upon Sir Francis Allston Channing, who makes another step upward in rank. Created a baronet in 1894, he now receives a barony, as a reward for his excellent services in promoting agricultural, educational, and labor reforms. He was born in the United States as the son of that famous Unitarian minister, of Boston, Rev. W. W. Channing. His wife is a Bostonian, the daughter of Henry Bryant of that city, and they have two children, both girls.

Baron Channing—to call him by his new title—was educated at Oxford, is a Fellow of University College, and was for some time tutor and lecturer in philosophy at that great seat of learning, where he carried for himself a very distinguished record, including honors both in classics and mathematics, the chancellor's English essay, and the Arnold historical essay.

To enumerate the various royal commissions on which he has served would make a long list and, besides, he has written several books on agriculture, politics, the classics, and natural history. He entered parliament for East Northamptonshire in 1885 and has sat there most of the time since, on the Liberal benches. He has taken a special interest in railroad employees, leading the movement to obtain a reduction of their hours of labor by parliamentary enactment.

In reply to an inquiry from a reader as to what has become of the peerage of Wenman, I would say that it has long ago become extinct. So far as I am aware there has been only one barony of that name, and it was created in the early part of the nineteenth century, under somewhat peculiar circumstances. It seems that William IV., during the lifetime of his father, George III., became involved in financial straits, largely through the extravagance of his illegitimate family by an actress, Mrs. Jordan, known on the stage as "Dolly Bland." Monetary troubles led him to desert her and he immediately began to look about for a rich wife in order to get the means of paying his debts. In due course he engaged himself to a very wealthy and mature spinster named Miss Wykeham, of Thames Park, Oxfordshire.

On William's accession to the throne in 1830, some sixteen or seventeen years after his jilting Miss Wykeham, he created her a peeress in her own right, granting her the Barony of Wenman, in gratitude for her having been so ready to assist him with her hand and fortune in the days of his poverty.

A few years later the regent arranged for the marriage of his sailor brother, William with Princess Adelaide of Saxe-Meiningen.

Daily Hints For the Cook

FANCY SANDWICH

Take a thin slice of tongue, a piece of the breast of a chicken, and mayonnaise of peas. To make the mayonnaise take the raw yolk of an egg, oil—added a drop at a time—and vinegar to thin it, together with salt and pepper as seasoning. When thick, mix it with cooked peas. Place a slice of chicken and a spoonful of pea mayonnaise on each slice of tongue. Roll the latter up like a pancake, and roll again in a very thin slice of bread and butter. Roll in paraffin paper; twisted at ends, to hold in form.

BUTTERSCOTCH PIE.
One cup of soft "A" sugar, two eggs,

two tablespoonfuls of flour, one cupful of cold water, two heaping tablespoonfuls of butter, one teaspoonful of vanilla extract, one baked pie-crust. Mix the sugar, flour, and yolks of eggs to a smooth paste; add gradually the water and the butter, and stir over the fire until thick; then add the vanilla extract. Pour into the pie crust. Beat up the whites of the eggs to a stiff froth, add two tablespoonfuls of sugar, put this on the top of the pie and brown slightly in the oven. If a few bananas are sliced into the pie and covered with the filling and the whites of the eggs an excellent dish will be the result.
