CHAPTER. XI.

"Dian," he said, suddenly, "what shall I do when you marry?"

"I? I shall never marry, papa. Why should I when I have Sir Royal and Rich, and you, papa—you who are all the world to me? I do not want to marry. I shall leave the sound of the word 'marriage' as long as I live!"

"So shall I," said Peter Cameron, with a deep sigh.

"Now, papa, you will write that letter this morning, will you not? Promise me."

"I promise you," he replied; but he was sore at heart, for he felt the task to be a most distasteful one.

What excuse could he make, and what would Lady Scarsdale think? Of course he loved Diana far better than any one else in the world; but Lady Scarsdale was a charming woman, and she had shown such marked kindness to him and his daughter. Still he had promised Dian, and it must be done, even though he sacrificed every prospect of making the acquaintance of the Duke of Stone and all his titled friends.

It was quite an hour after this little scene that Dian, having somewhat recovered her usual composure, went in search of the delinquent John Brown. She had no angry words for him, but flung her arms round his curly neck.

"We have had a narrow escape, John Brown," she said; and the dog's intelligent eyes seemed to answer her. "No other mistress shall come here, John Brown," said the heiress. "Fidelity belongs to me and to you; we will have no dainty-footed aristocrat here. This is the Fortress of the free."

"What an escape!" she repeated to herself many times that day; and she shuddered as she thought of it. She tried to imagine Lady Scarsdale in those rooms where she had reigned supreme. "I should have died had she come here as mistress," said Diana to herself. "Thank Heaven it is settled; she will leave the country, I should imagine, now."

She had been so completely indulged and so thoroughly obeyed all her life that she had no idea it could ever be otherwise. Having perfect faith in herself, she never dreamed that Lady Scarsdale might laugh at such a letter. Indeed, she imagined, in her girlish innocence, that the letter had only to be sent to secure the complete annulment of the compact so solemnly entered into by her father and Lady Scarsdale. She was, therefore, quite happy again when she knew that her father had written and sent it.

"I shall not let any designing widows come near you again, papa," she said.

And he answered ruefully that the lesson he had had would last him his lifetime.

CHAPTER. XII.

Lady Scarsdale stood before her toilet-table, thinking that, after all, she was conferring a far greater favor on Peter Cameron than he conferred on her. She had been looking in her mirror, and found her face still handsome and well preserved. There was not one white hair in the soft silky mass that fell over her shoulders, nor dimness in the dark eyes that had looked on so many varied scenes of life. There had been a look of care, but this morning it had disappeared, and the white brow was smooth as that of a child.

"I am still a handsome woman," she said to herself, as a gorgeous vision of magnificent dresses floated before her; and she gave a sigh of unutterable content. No more bills, no more duns, no more anxiety! She was going to marry a man with three millions of money, and the very sound of the words was music to her ears.

As she stood admiring her still handsome features, and congratulating herself that the struggle of life was over at last, a knock came to the door, and Mrs. Flowers, the trusted and faithful waiting-maid, entered.

Lady Scarsdale had almost solved the problem of how to live without money; but she could never have lived without Flowers. Inquisitive people wondered where the dresses of her ladyship and her daughters could possibly come from. They knew nothing of the skill and genius of their maid. She could transform an old gown into a new one, with the help of a few flowers and a little lace; she could change the appearance of a dress so as to render it impossible of recognition. She was a treasure, a small fortune in herself, and truly faithful to her mistress. Whoever else went unpaid, Flowers always received her wages; and Lady Scarsdale owned she was worth them. She could never have won her social triumphs but for Flowers.

When the maid opened the door, Lady Scarsdale's first thought was that, as soon as she was married, she would double Flowers' wages. Then she saw a letter in the woman's hands.

"For me!" she said.

"Yes, my lady," was the reply.

And Lady Scarsdale, recognizing Mr. Cameron's handwriting, broke open the seal. It did credit to her strength of mind that she neither fainted nor cried out as she read, believing as she did that the castle of cards she had built with such care had toppled to the ground, for the letter ran thus:

"My Dear Lady Scarsdale—I cannot tell you how sorry I am to write this letter; but it must be done. I have been discussing the question of our proposed marriage with my daughter, and I find that she is so utterly averse to it that I am most reluctantly compelled to ask you to release me from my promise. As my chief thought is my daughter's happiness, it would be absurd for me to take any step that would tend to make her miserable; and she is frank enough to tell me that she would rather die than that this union should take place. In these circumstances I have no alternative but to ask your ladyship to forget what has passed between us. I shall always entertain for you the highest regard and esteem, and most deeply regret that the relationship between us can never be other than that of friends."

Lady Scarsdale read it attentively; but there was no sign of emotion.

"There is no answer, Flowers," she said; and the maid withdrew.

Then she let her mask fall. A torrent of rage swept over and distorted her face.

"Is the man mad?" she cried, as she crushed the letter in her hand. "Does he think I am going to lose the control of three millions of money as easily as that?"

She read the letter again, slowly and carefully.

"It is not himself; it is his daughter," she said. And from that moment a bitter, almost vindictive, hatred of Diana entered her heart, and never entirely left it—a bitter, intense hatred, which she promised herself should some day leave its mark.

"It is Diana I have to thank for this outrage," she said. "I will repay her. I do not want to relinquish her power and authority, but, as surely as the sun shines in heaven, she shall lose more than that. If she had been kind, cordial, reasonable. If she had made a friend of me instead of a foe, I would have been generous itself. I would have befriended her in every way. Now let her look to herself. It is war to the knife."

She took some little time to think over her answer to the letter. In any case she felt tolerably safe. If he adhered to his intention, and the marriage did not take place, she would sue him for damages, and the compensation she would get would make her a rich woman. At length she wrote; and her letter ran as follows:

My Dear Mr. Cameron.—Knowing, and fully appreciating, your great affection for your beautiful daughter, your letter was not a great surprise to me. I quite understand the feelings which prompted you to write it. But of course it would be impossible for you to allow the whim of a child to interfere with a pledge so solemnly given; nor can I obey the caprice of a child by altering arrangements so solemnly entered into. If the matter rested entirely in my hands, I might soon dispose of it; but it does not. All my friends and relatives are apprised of it; and last evening I wrote, after you had left me, to inform the Duke and Duchess of Stone. You will see, therefore, that some better reason than the whim and caprice of a girl must be given before our arrangements can be altered. Come over to Treham, and let me see what I can say to you.

"Yours very affectionately,
"HERMIONE SCARSDALE."

Lady Scarsdale flattered herself she had not written one word too much or too little. Peter Cameron, though he understood what the letter said, was at a loss how to construe it.

He rode over to Treham, expecting coldness, even reproaches; but her ladyship's reception of him was another triumph of art. Amusement, ratiolery, coquetry, and shyness seemed mingled in her manner toward him.

"Let us take a stroll in the garden," she said. "We want a friendly talk, not a stately interview."

STRIKE SETTLED.
HALIFAX, N.S., Oct. 5.
(Flash London).—The railway strike has been settled.

BLOCKADE LIFTED.

ROME, Oct. 4.
Orders that the blockade of Fiume be lifted, have been issued by the Government and the Italian authorities in the vicinity of Fiume have received an order to allow mail and foodstuffs to pass into the city, according to the Joca. Military blockade against soldiers and civilians entering the city, all that is now being enforced, according to newspapers, which say the decision was made after the Government had examined and discussed a protest from the Fiume National Council.

THE KING'S MOTOR JOURNEY.

LONDON, Oct. 5.
(Reuter's).—The strike has been marked by many picturesque features but none more remarkable in view of the traditions of royal progresses than their Majesties' motor journey of 547 miles to London from Balmoral. The King returned earlier than he had intended, being anxious to get in touch with his advisers. In view of the crisis it would have been possible to have arranged for a special train, but his Majesty preferred to share the experiences of so many of his subjects and travel by road. Starting on Friday their Majesties took the short cut across the Grampians, over Spital and Glenelg, through Perth, Sterling, Lanark and Carlisle and spent Friday night at Lowther Castle as guests of Lord and Lady Londonderry. They travelled all day yesterday via Alton, Doncaster, Grantham, and Hatfield, arriving at Buckingham Palace at five o'clock in the afternoon, a crowd at the gates cheered their safe arrival. The only attendants of their Majesties were Lord Stamfordham, the King's Private Secretary, and Col. Cleve Wigram, Assistant Private Secretary and Equerry. Princess Mary remained at Balmoral. Prince Albert and Henry left Aberdeen yesterday, proceeding to London by ordinary passenger steamer. Premier Lloyd George will probably see the King to-day.
