"What!" exclaimed Flora, with great agitation, again gazing at the advancing men.

"Oh, it is indeed he," she wildly cried, bursting inio tears. "Oh, Hector, they will murder you. My nucle's farry will be such that he will astack you at once, and these others will assist him. Oh, what is to be done? You cannot be allowed to die thus. Can I assist you?"

"Be calm, my love, be calm," said Hector, soothingly, in reply. "It may not be so bad as you fear. Your uncle I fear not, and Ian M'Kenzie and his caterans will learn that the Hector M'Leod of to day refreshed and strong, is something very different from the Hector M'Leod of yesternight, exhausted and weak. Here, my darling, here is something for you," and as he spoke he handed her a tiny pistol, neatly mounted. "You know how to use it. If I should fall (and I may, you know), and Ian M'Kenzie dare lay a hand on you, shoot him with it as you would a dog. But do not mix in the fray, for a chance stroke might prove your casth wound."

"I will do as you desire, dearest, everything as you wish," and our heroine spoke in a tone of calm determination.

"And now, my darling," exclaimed Hector, imprinting a kiss on her brow, wit may be our parting kiss. There is no furthur time for words, for here your neach wound."

"Donald Cameron pursues us on horseback, and is within a mile of Kinloch Ewe."

"What do you say?" cried M'Leod, huskily, while an expression of vexation and annoyance crossed his face.

"Come this way, quick!" cried Flora, re-entering the room, and pointing through the window. "Do you not recognise him?"

Hector looked.

"Yes; I recognize him," replied the youth calmly, a look of stern determination succeeded the vexed expression which had previously taken possession of his features.

"And we must await his coming," he continued. "I find that we cannot have horses."

For a moment the landlord paused as if undecided.

"Damnation! answer me at once, or I shall throttle you," shouted the other with suchterrible vehemence as he sprang from his steed that Gregor almost leaped with terror, and he turned with quaking limbs and terrified looks and pointed to the door of the room in which Flora and Hector were listeners to the colloque.

"Ha!" exclaimed the other, a look of ferce trimph lighting up his face; "now will I give an impertinent boy such a lessons as he merits."

The next instant the parlour door opened, and the new comer appeared on the threshold, glaring with eyes full of hatred upon Hector M-Leod, who stood calmly confronting him.
