Mrs. Remington smiled. She knew well enough that the fair girl loved Max, and she meant to tell her, just as soon as she was able to bear it, all about that wretched mistake regarding the box of flowers. She kissed her again fondly, and then Boftly left the room. Hastening hume she partook of a light lunch, and informed Jane that for a few days she was going to assist in the care of the young girl who was ill in the neighboring hotel; then she sat down to her desk and penned the following brief note to Max:

"Dear Max.—Such a strange thing has happened! By the merest chance I discovered today that Agnes is lying very ill at the — Hotel. I went at once to her and found her exceedingly low, but the fever turned while I was with her, and I believe that with proper care she will now recover. I shall remain with her for the present, as she seems to cling to me. If you return before I do, come to me there and I will explain everything to you. Affectionately, MOTHER."

Gathering a few necessary articles to-gether, Mrs. Remington returned at once to the hotel, arriving in the sick-room before her hour had expired, and was amply rewarded for her haste by the glad look with which Agnes welcomed

The next few days were very trying ones both to this kind friend and the faithful nurse, for Agnes was so very weak that she needed the closest atten-tion. Her vitality had been so much re-duced by the exhaustive fever that her physician said it would take but little, even now, to snap the slender thread of her life.

Mrs. Remington and the nurse divided Mrs. Remington and the nurse divided the wearisome vigils between them for the next three days, and at the end of that time both women were satisfied that there had really been a gain on the part of their patient. On the morning of the fourth day, after a very comfortable hight, there was a decided improvement, and when Dr. Baymand made his visit

She was young to die, she thought, but she wondered if it would not have been better for her if she could have slipped within those portals whither her mother had so recently gone: She believed that poor, lonely Mr. Archibald would have missed her, and that, doubtless kind Mrs. Remington would have been sorry for her; but, aside from these two, she knew no one who would grieve for her, while the future did not seem to hold much of promise to her, now that she had lost Max.

physician saw that, while he had meant to encourage her, he had started a very somber train of thought, and he immediately changed the subject by laughingly asking when she would be ready to take a sleigh-ride with him.

Agnes laughed at the idea of measuring her rations by the gallon, when the nurse still persisted in doling them out by the spoonful, and Doctor Raymond, having accomplished his object to make her more cheerful, took his leave, feeling greatly encouraged by her condition.

Later in the day a servant came to the door and put a note into Mrs. Remington's hands. ton's hands. It proved to be from Max, telling her that he was below, and waiting anxious-that he was below, and waiting anxiously to see her.

She turned at once to the bed.

"Agnes," she said, "I have a caller below, and shall be obliged to leave you for a little while. It is Max, and he says, 'Tell her I am deeply grieved to learn of her illness.' May I take him some message from you in return?"

Agnes flushed vividly, and her lips quivered slightly, but she shook her head, without meeting her friend's gaze, and Mrs. Remington immediately left the room, feeling that there must have been something more, to cause this extreme reticence and coldness, than either she or Max had surmised. She did not dream that Laura could have told her that she was Max's promised wife.

Reaching the reception-room, she found Max there, excitedly pacing the floor, and looking both pale and worn.

"What does this mean?" he demanded, in an anxious tone, after he had greeted her.

her.

"Sit down, Max," his mother calmly returned; "there is no occasion for you to be so wrought up—"

"How is she?" he interposed, but dropping into the nearest chair, for his anxiety during the last few days had told sadly upon him.

"Better. She is going to get well, if nothing unforeseen happens. And now I will tell you all that I know about her being here—which, however, I fear is but a small part of what appears to be a great mystery, as we have not dared to question her upon the subject yet."

Mrs. Remington then related how her attention had been attracted by hearing attention had been attracted by hearing that agonized cry of "Max! Max! Oh, save me!" and the steps she had taken fourth day, after a very comfortable hight, there was a decided improvement, and when Dr. Raymond made his visit at the usual hour, he remarked, in his bright, cheery way, and with a note of extreme satisfaction in his tone:

"Well, my young lady, I feel safe now in promising you a new lease of life."

"Have I been so very sick?" she asked, wonderingly.

Three weeks of her illness, as we know, had been a blank to her, while during the last few days she had been so weak as not to realize much save that her dear friend, Mrs. Remington, was with her, and she was therefore safe, and had nothing more to fear from her ruthless persecutor. Herbert Abbott.

The doctor smiled at her question, while he replied with great gentleness:

"My dear, I don't believe you will ever get as near heaven again without going in beyond its gates of pearl."

Tears started to the eyes of the sick strl.

She was young to die, she thought, but she wondered if it would not have been "That is a matter which no one can be save me!" and the steps she had taken to learn what it meant; together with what Mr. Howard had told her about Agnes coming to his house in that fearful strm, so late at night, and her sub-sequent illness.

"This is all that I can tell you," she said in conclusion, "for the dear child has been very near death's door, and ot course we have avoided everything that would be likely to agitate her; but she will doubtless, explain the mystery just as soon as she is able to talk more."

"Well, I can throw a faint light on the matter." Max replied: whereupon he told her of his meeting Mr. Archibald, and what he had disclosed regarding Agnes' visit to Elgin.

But how she had happened to come to the hote! — Hotel in company with that strange man still remained a most tantalizing mystery.

"Who can this 'A. Herbert' be?" Max said, with compressed lips, after spending several moments silently trying to solve the puzzle.

"That is a gonized creating had taken to learn what it meant; together with all the condition.

"That is a matter which no one can explain save Agnes herself, and perhaps explain save Agnes herself, and perhaps even she may not be able to enlighten us," returned Mrs. Remington. "He may have been some stranger whom she met on the train, who offered to assist her during the delay, and then, upon reaching the city, he doubtless treacherously brought her here. Mr. Harwood says he never saw the man before. He was apparently about twenty-four, tall, dark, with Burnside whiskers, and very richly dressed."

"If I can ever lay my hands upon him "If I can ever lay my names upon min-as I hope to do—it will be a sorry day for him." Max said, with a look under which Herbert Abbot would have quaked could be have seen it. "What a narrow escape the dear girl has had!" he added, "Whenever you will let me," she answered, smiling, "and you can tell better hat I whether I will get one at all this winter."
"Well, you will have to look less like could he have seen it. "What a harrow could he have seen it." "What a harrow could he have seen it. "What a harrow could he have seen it." "What a harrow could he have seen it. "What a harrow could he have seen it." "What a harrow have seen have

"Has—she inquired for me?" Max asked eagerly.

"Has—she inquired for me?" Max asked eagerly.

"No, dear boy, she has not spoken your name once since she recovered consciousness; before that she called for you constantly."

The young man's face fell.

He cared nothing for what she might have said during her delirium; but this studied avoidance of all reference to him now that she had her reason again, cut him keenly.

"Do not worry over it, Max," his mother continued, seeing his troubled look, "I am sure that everything will come right when she gets stronger. There is

"I am sure that everything will come right when she gets stronger. There is some complication that we cannot understand, and for which—it has just occurred to me,"—she added, suddenly, "Laura may have been to blame." "Sure enough; I had not thought of that!" said Max, looking enlightened, "Laura may have told her something of what happened that night. Poor girl! what a hard time she has had since she left us. I won't keep you longer from her," he continued, rising, "but I shall come again tomorrow to ascertain how come again tomorrow to ascertain how she is."
"You will not mind then, Max, if I remain with her?" Mrs. Remington inquired, as she slipped her hand affectionately within his arm. "I feel as if I ought to go home and take care of you, and yet it does not seem as if I could leave her just yet."

"No, indeed, mother, I shall not mind; stay by all means. I prefer that you

"No, indeed, mother, I shall not mind; stay by all means; I prefer that you should, and I shall do well enough. I shall not have to go away again this week, and I will come to see you every day. I feel like a different man already now that Agnes is found, and I must go at once to seek Mr. Archibald and tell him the good news."

He kissed his mother, and then went away, looking as if he were indeed relieved of a heavy burden.

The mystery and suspense regarding the dear girl's fate was over; she was safe and under his mother's protection, and even if she was still offended with him for having, as she believed, treated her dishonorably, he felt that he could afford to wait patiently until she was able to hear the justifying explanations which he was confident he could make. He found Mr. Archibald sitting alone in his office, looking dejected and miserable, even more untidy and pittable than when he had last seen him.

He started to his feet, a strained, unnatural expression on his face, the moment he beheld Max, for something in his manner seemed to tell him that he had news for him.

"You have heard something?" he be-his manner seemed to tell him that he had news for him.

"You have heard something?" he began, tremulously.
"Yes, sir, I bring you good tidings of the lost one," the young man cheerfully responded.

He was wholly unprepared for the effect of this upon the old gentleman, and immediately regretted having spoken so abruptly.

Mr. Archibald collapsed in an instant, sinking weakly back in his chair, while he began to tremble violently. "Found?" he gasped, in an agitated Max reached for a glass of water that stood on a table near by, and held it to

Why Japanese Women Look Pleasant.

[Pearson's Weekly.]

Perhaps the secret of the sweet expression and habitual serenity of the Japanese women can be found in their freedom from small worries. The fashion of dress never varying saves the wear of mind on that subject, and the bareness of the houses and simplicity of diet make housekeeping a mere bagatelle. Everything is exquisitely clean, and easily kept so. There is no paint, no drapery, no crowd of little ornaments, no coming into the houses with the footwear worn in a dusty street. And then the feeling of living in rooms that can be turned into balconies and verandas at a moment's notice, of having walls that slide away as freely as do the scenes on the stage, and let in all out-of-doors or change the suites of rooms to the shape and size that the whim of the day or the hour re-

HABITS FORMED BY PLAY.

Through play the child forms those habits and tastes that crystallize into character. By character here is meant, not the whole man, but its manifestations through habitual practices and manner of life. In this sense character has well been defined as "a bundle of habits." We work, and talk, and behave in general as we have been mostly accustomed to or in the habit of doing. Let us note, then, that the child forms his habits chiefly through play and social environment. No matter what he is taught at home or at school he is strongly inclined to imitate his playmates, and to be influenced by his play-time surroundings. Who does not know this to be a fact? Prolonged life of this kind forms the habits and creates the tastes that control the conduct and define the character.

All the above means that play is ordained by the Creator to supplement the other educational activities: to develop the physical and mental health and vigor, to build character, train citizenship, and produce the highest ossible types of manhood and womanhood. For achieving this end play bears the same relation towards the emotional faculties which the hunger for truth or knowledge sustains towards the intellectual life. To suppress it, as is widely done today, means to suppress the child's growth and to dwarf body and mind. To neglect it, as is also universally prevalent, means to have the child fed, in this respect, on poisonous food in the streets, alleys and other rowdy gatherings, and to beome a man or woman of low tastes. vulgar habits, degrading tendenciesblishted life-By S. V. Tsanoff, in Home and Flowers.

silos and silo building, and numerous turer, who has seen a number of these plans have been published, but in silos in operation, thinks highly of actual experience none of them has them. proved entirely satisfactory. Some are too expensive for ordinary farmers, sioner. others are cheap, but last only a few years. The round stave silo is one of the cheapest sort, and if it were not liable to collapse on account of shrinkage of the staves, and the expansion of the iron hoops, it would be very satisfactory. There is now a prospect of these disadvantages being overcome. number of farmers in the United States have adopted the plan of using wooden hoops, which cannot shrink or lengthen endwise. The inside sheeting is of one inch Georgia pine, which seems to be the best kind of lumber for silos, on account of its nonshrinkable character. It is so full of pitch that moisture has practically no effect upon it. This lumber has been recently laid down at Ottawa for $27 per thousand, and at that price should be one of the most economical gur farmers could use.

THE FOUNDATION. The foundation of this new sort of silo is in its wooden hoops, six inches wide, and made of half-inch elm lumber, sprung around a form, and built up with well lapped joints, using a trifle longer nail each time, until the hoop has a thickness for the three bottom hoops of five layers. The remaining five hoops require only four layers each. The average silo will not require more than 500 feet of lumber, and twenty pounds of nails, for the hoops, which are easily and quickly made and should not cost more than $1 25 each, or $10 for the lot. This is a good deal less than the cost of the usual iron hoops and lugs. A three-cornered frame is erected at the exact outside circumference of the silo, and the hoops placed in position and fastened.

The lining of the silo is then put on, and should be of inch Georgia pine lumber three inches wide, matched and nailed to the hoops the same as the flooring. When the lining is en within twenty inches of the starting place, stop and put in 2x4 studding, up and down, between the hoops on each side of the door for door stays and jambs. If the silo is outside the barn, it can be covered with tarred paper, and cheap siding, run both up and down as a protection against frost. The roof and foundation is the same as for any silo, and the outside covering could be of any sort the owner wished, or it might go without siding, the same as any other tub silo. If protected from the weather the wooden hoops should last for years, and if at any time the inside lining became dozy it might be lined with tarred paper, and then sheeting, thereby making it serviceable again for a number of years at

A Well-Known Dairyman Run Into

By a Train. was run into by a train and had both my legs, ankle and shoulder broken, and was laid up in the general hospital for five months. The fractures healed, but my limbs were so sore and stiff that I could scarcely use them to stand or walk upon. I left the hospit-al, went home and tried a number of liniments; none did me any good. I was then recommended to try Kelpion; and from the first application of Kelpion the pain and stiffness ceased, and by the free use of it, well rubbed in, I was enabled in a few days to return to my business and suffered comparatively no pain. I still use it when necessary, and would not be without it in my house. I am constantly recommending it to persons on my route for every ailment I hear of, and can truly say that so far I have never heard of 'Kelpion" failing to accomplish a relief or cure in any one instance.
