Delights Large Audience With Dancing At Grand

With eagerness London seized apon its first opportunity of seeing Ruth St. Denis. Ted Shawn and the famous' Denishawn dancers. Their single performance here Thanksgiving night saw the Grand Opera. House filled to the doors with those who sought a glimpse of dancers so internationally famous.

There have been in the city no greater exponents of the poetry of motion, and the vivid numbers carried with them a power to thrill and enrapture an audience vastly less susceptible than that which greeted them here Monday night.

Ruth St. Denis is, of course, past mistress of her art. Her dancing is flawless and the epitome of grace, yet so colorful and inspired that to those who saw her for the first time, as did many of the audience, it carried the appeal of something supernatural.

Her partner, Ted Shawn, radiates a stirring virility, and strength and beauty pervade his every movement. His dances seemed symbolic of powerful masculinity, yet were executed with the deft nimbleness of a fawn. He ran the gamut of the men of the iges, the dazzling Tolec emperor, to the slenderly, graceful Spaniard, en dowing each with a grace and rhythmic beauty unsurpassed.

Models of Beauty.

As for the Denishawn dancers, there were eight of them, each model of beauty and symmetry, with every fibre tuned in ready response to the melody they heard and the inspiration of its theme.

It was as if the dancers reached into every phase of human emotion and brought a picture from every corner of the world, so comprehensive was their program. Their last numbers were vivid portrayals of the bizarre splendors of the Orient, together with the sweet picturesqueness of Japan, and the ombre magnificence of an Egyptian Each dance was invested with a color and romance which gave it the indelible stamp of lasting beauty. Ruth St. Denis entered upon the closing section of the program with her dance of "Kuan Yin," the Budhist deity, wrapping about her every movement an indefinable something, which kept from it any taint of earthliness, and threw over it eeriness of things not of this earth.

Remarkable yet true it was that this same dancer glided in sinuous silken folds to amorous Spanish music and clicked golden chains and anklets, and in the riotous grace of the nautch girl.
