

MEMORY.

The capacity of the human mind for memorizing is all but infinite. There is nothing so difficult that we cannot memorize it, if it is presented to our mind in the proper way. The presentation must be systematic, and the order logical. Too much must not be forced on the mind at once. Disregard of these facts leads to confusion, and where confusion exists there can be no real act of memory. The failure of the common methods of teaching language is due in large measure to the total disregard of the laws of memory and of the mind in general. The success of the De Brisay Analytical Method is due very largely to the fact that it makes memory a first consideration.
