WILL ENFORCE PROHIBITION

The opposition party, if placed in power, will enforce the prohibitory law which is on the statute books and which will come into effect on May 1. W. E. Foster has publicly declared over and over again that this is the policy of the opposition. His supporters Any statement to the contrary is a deliberate falsehood

No doubt the fighting ability of France has been the greatest sensation of the war. The French people were not expected to do what they have done, and this was due to the common mistake that the boulevardiers of Paris were the French people. They were the French people. They were the French people. They were the French people that most visitors saw; and they have done their share of the stiff fighting, but they have not played the part that the French peasant and mechanic have played. with children who make herculean efforts to keep the home together after being thrown on their own resources by the deaths of their husbands. Their privations are great and too often they are overcome in the struggle and are forced to witness their homes broken and the family separated. Just a little aid of the sort that does not make paupers and which can be accepted as a proper provision made by the state for deserving unfortunates would bridge the gap and unfortunates would bridge the gap and keep the family together until the children reach an age that will permit them to assist in the family support.

There can be no argument as to the economic advantages of such a measure for it will prevent pauperism and en-able thousands of children to be brought up under wholesome home surroundings, rather than among strangers, or in some charitable institution where, once placed, they are likely to remain for life. One of the great fears of the mother with dependent children is that of separation which under our present system may be made necessary at any time if the mother is temporarily out of work or suffering from illness. Never has a mothers' pension law been so necessary as at the present time when the cost of existence has risen beyond the possibility of many mothers who have hereto-fore been able with the pittance they have been able to earn to keep the home together. A little aid will go far toward keeping deserving families together and breed sturdy, self-reliant children rather than dependents who have lost hope and courage through a losing struggle to
