Battle Record of the New Zealand

WELLINGTON, New Zealand.—When the Germans in 1909 started Britain by a sudden expansion of their naval program, the New Zealand Government decided to add a capital ship to the British Navy as a gift from the Dominion. This ship, laid down in 1910 and completed in 1912, was the armored cruiser Blucher, at the battle cruiser New Zealand, a 27-knot ship of 18,800 tons, having a main armament of eight 12-inch guns. The battle cruiser visited dominion waters in 1913, and is now back again with the honors, if not the scars, of war upon her.

The New Zealand took part in every action that occurred in the North Sea during the course of the war. She sank a German cruiser, the Kohn, at the Heligoland light, and another one, the armored cruiser Blucher, at the Dogger Bank engagement. She was in the line next to the Queen Mary and the Indefatigable at the Battle of Jutland when those battle cruisers were sunk by the fire of the German battleships, and she took the vacant position. She fired 430 shots from her heavy guns during the engagement and received one blow from a spent shell in return. Her marksmanship during that battle was conspicuously good, her gunners scoring repeated hits on the German ships.

If the Germans had been able to pierce into the coming tower of the New Zealand during any of the engagements in which she took part, they would have been startled. They would have seen a British officer wearing over his workaday uniform an ample Maori mar, with an ancient greenstone "tiki" or Maori stone, hung round his neck. When the battle cruiser was here in 1913 the Maori chiefs, descendants of the fighting men and navigators who colonized the whole of the South Pacific long before the earliest white explorer reached these waters, presented the mat and the tiki to the captain and took his promise that if ever he went into action in that ship, he would go arrayed as a true New Zealand warrior.

The face of a grim Maori was emblazoned upon the forward fighting top of the New Zealand, and a traditional Maori war cry was carved upon the wheel. This war cry—"Ake Ake Ake, Kia Kaha" (For ever and for ever, be strong, get on)—was adopted by the crew of the battle cruiser, and it was chanted in steel turrets as once it had been chanted in native war canoes. So the Maori, whose own sons fought on Gallipoli and in France, are not at all surprised that the New Zealand should have achieved greatly in the war. They know that she carried with her the mana, the fighting impulse of famous Maori warriors.

Household Notes.

If you are growing bulbs for winter blooming, remember that they must have five to eight weeks to get their roots well started.

When you rip an old garment, first cut a few stitches with the scissors; then pin the material to your knee and rip with a sharp knife.
