The Prince "Crossing the Line."

(From the Manchester Guardian.)
From the accounts that have been telegraphed of the way in which the Prince of Wales was initiated into the company of those travellers who have "crossed the line" his rank does not seem to have brought him any softening of the full ritual. He is described as submitting to all the lathering, shaving, and ducking that is required, though Captain Murray, in the well-known description of the ceremony that is given in "Frank Milidmay," adds that officers "escape by paying a fine in money or rum." The whole ritual dates from the days of sailing ships, and was observed by the crews of men-of-war, merchant ships, and whalers—indeed, in those days the sailor who had not crossed the line and submitted to it was not regarded as having completed his nautical education. There seems to be no particular reason for the practice beyond a natural readiness to seize an excuse for enlivening a long voyage by a very practical sort of joke. One wonders how many other heirs to Royal thrones would consent to be the victim of a "rag" of this kind.

He Knew.

Miss Estelle Dudley, who, though only twelve years old, is a clever musician and composer, and an accomplished actress, made a party of "grown-ups" laugh heartily the other day over a tale she told about a certain little boy who used to be a playmate of hers not so very long ago.
He went to Sunday school (said Estelle), and his teacher was doing her best by him.
"You know," she said, "that if you live right on this earth, and follow the golden rule, doing to others as you would be done by, you will go to the place of everlasting bliss. But in case you are bad, what then?"
"I know!" cried the small boy, "if you're bad, you go to the place of everlasting blisters."

Mainly About People.

The London mansion of the Duchess of Albany has for 300 years been the scene of many brilliant assemblages, but never exceeding the recent fancy dress ball attended by royalty. The American women guests, led by the wife of Ambassador Davis, wore Martha Washington frocks made by themselves. The English women wore Gainsborough costumes, and the French in garbs of marquise and the peasants of the 16th century. The Duchess of Albany wore her wedding day gown, Princess Alice wore daffodil yellow, Princess Helena Victoria natterier blue.

One of the biggest of England's oil men is Sir Marcus Samuel, Bart. He has been honored by the British, French, Belgian and Japanese governments. The emperor of Japan made him a knight commander of the Order of the Rising Sun. He was Lord Mayor of London in 1903. He is to-day the largest importer of petrol for motors in Europe.

Lucius Metz, an ex-soldier, came to New York from Spokane, because he believed he had a voice. He became a telegraph messenger and his first message carried him to the Metropolitan Opera House. Marie Sundelins sent him to an instructor, who is confident he made a find. Metz has now a three years' theatrical contract with a salary ranging from $150 to $400 weekly, and a $1200-a-year church choir contract.

Senator Warren G. Harding, of Ohio, can set type, operate the linotype, make up forms, run the press, get up the local news, write the editorials. November next he will be 55 years of age. He paid for his schooling by farm work, teaching school and house painting. After his election to the Senate, while in a strange town, he asked for a job. They tried him out at a linotype and he secured the job, and then introduced himself.

The Oulja board has a defender in Dr. Abraham Wallace, a noted British scientist, who is now on his way home after an American lecture tour. He is a friend and associate of Sir Oliver Lodge. The board "is a sacred instrument in use in Tibet for 200 years." Dr. Wallace is president in England of the Society for the Study of Supernormal Pictures. He holds the other world will become so well known that there will be no fear of death.

Shepherd Frederick, former minister of Hungary, and for a time its premier, and now under indictment for murder, is the purest possible specimen of an adventurer and demagogue. He was a small peasant manufacturer of machinery when he organized the secret "People's Society" on the Russian plan. It was this organization and Trotsky's money that landed him in power. He assassinated Count A. Stephen Tisza to get the premiership.

Pat Valdo, one of the famous clowns of America, has a 58-acre farm in Massachusetts. His wife is a circus performer. At high school his ambition was to become a writer. When the circus came the lure proved irresistible. Now he divides his time between the farm, books and the ring. Many short story writers and cartoonists are his friends, for he is chock full of ideas.

Lady Geddes, the wife of the newly appointed British Ambassador to Washington, is generally spoken of as an American woman. This, the Fall Mail Gazette points out, is incorrect. Lady Geddes was born in New York State and educated at Windsor, Nova Scotia, but she is the daughter of W. A. Ross, of Belfast, who spent much of his time in America, but who, the paper says, was never naturalized. Sir Auckland and Lady Geddes were married in 1906 and have five children.

England has a group of "Petrol Princesses," men who have made big fortunes in oil. The head prince is Sir Marcus Samuel, and others are Sir Charles Greenway, Sir John T. Garrill, Lord Cowdrey, H. W. A. Deterding, Waley Cohen and F. E. Powell. They control petroleum, and their interests are so interwoven that to touch one is to touch all. They constitute without formation an English Standard Oil. Their power is immense and their fortunes greater. They have a way of "passing the buck," that confounds their enemies.

One of the strangest characters in the world is Auguste Englehardt a young German who lives on the island of Kabakon in the German New Guinea territory. He exists entirely on the coconuts, and sleep on a bed of sand. Englehardt is a singularly handsome man of about 35, possessing great wealth and a charming personality. He is known as the "Apostle of the Coconut" on account of the doctrine he teaches that the coconut is the original food of man, and should continue to be so, as all other foods are responsible for the bad passion in the heart and mind of man.
