The Army Service Corps

BY CORPORAL CRESWELL,

There's a handful of men in the Army Who seldom shoulder a gun, There's little that's known about them When everything's said and done;

And they try to escape any notice As they quietly slip off to war, For they never expect a send-off In the Army Service Corps. They don't aim at capturing prisoners,

Or at taking the enemy's flag, But they serve, in a humbler vocation For the sake of the grand old rag; Amid the inferno of battle And in spite of the cannon's roar, They keep on quietly working

In the Army Service Corps. When the foemen's heavy gunfire

Has scattered and smashed their supplies,
They take good grips on their upper lips,

And with "Never-say-die" in their eyes, They hustle around and check things up,

And put them in order once more, For they don't know the meaning of quitting In the Army Service Corps.

When their fellow-soldiers are resting, Awaiting a new day's dawn,

They are desperately heaving and straining, With muscle and sinew and brawn-For they must deliver the rations,

Although they are weary and sore, They are cracking good men that can stick it In the Army Service Corps. And when the war is over, And peace again doth reign,

Back to their homes once again; They try to escape any notice As they quietly slip ashore, For it's a way they have of doing things In the Army Service Corps.

This handful of men silently turn
