Cop Spoils Lad's Purchase of Smoke,

He was a small boy, five years old and could not talk plainly enough to be understood by strangers. So small was he that one feared he might be lost in the crowd that thronged the streets on Wednesday night. When first seen he dodged out from behind a lamp post at the corner of Dundas and Wellington streets about 9 o'clock. A passing auto struck him, but he was uninjured and after the little excite In his chubby little arms he hugged Presumably for Dad a cigar box. One was reminded of the story of Mark Twaln, who was accosted by a matronly woman when along the blocks. He appeared to be and held up the coin which had been along the blocks. He appeared to be collecting souvenirs of some sort. Possibly he was gathering stray flig leaves to send to the Fiji Islanders, so that they might protect themselves from the sun. At any rate, he was meeting with considerable success in his mission, whatever it was. This could be gathered from one look at his smiling contenance as he trudged along the street.

One kindly old gentleman pressed a Canadian nickle in the lad's hand. Without bothering to attempt to show his appreciation, the kiddy beat it for the nearest cigar store, which happened to be in a pool room. Standing in front of the show case he pointed his fat little finger towards a cigar.

and held up the coin which had been given him. He could not make himself with the wanted. Whether he wanted to but a present for dad or not could not be learned. Whether he wanted to buy a present for dad or not could not be learned, for just at this time a "cop" happened on the scene and took him in charge. He was taken over to the police station, where a call was received from his anxious parents, who had been searching for him for some time. His father came down for him and the lad went home, and for many moons he will regale his companions with the story of how he did the night sights of Calvary." The soloists for the could not make himself understood by talking, but he clearly indicated what he wanted. Whether he
