These memoirs of an able soldier, intimately acquainted with the situation in Asia, and holding advisory positions of great importance, were suppressed for reasons sufficiently apparent from the initial article by the translator, George Kennan. It deals with Kuropatkin's narrative of the events that preceded the rupture with Japan, and on its international side may be taken as substantially relieving that nation from the responsibility of provoking hostilities. But Bezobrazoff required the protection of Russian soldiery in connection with his timber operations, and objected to his company being made a purely commercial concern. His activity on the Yalu had meantime greatly irritated Japan, and Kuropatkin's reports to the emperor contain clear warnings that Bezobrazoff's plans, if carried out, would inevitably cause complications. Unfortunately for Russia, the latter's influence was strong enough to suspend the evacuation, while in the hands of Admiral Alexieff, who is under grave suspicion of playing a double part all thru this critical period, the negotiations rapidly became strained, and were finally broken off on Feb. 6, 1904. Thus while the forward policy of Russia had resulted in the securing of an open port, and in a great increase of its sphere of influence, the bait of lation tempted the czar to sanction a course that led directly to war to the

This question General Kuropatkin answers by revealing a remarkable story connected with a Russian timber company, formed to exploit the vast forest wealth of the Upper Yalu River.

According to General Kuropatkin, the evil genius of the Russian Empire in the year 1903 was a certain Alexander Mikhailovitch Bezobrazoff, a Russian promoter and speculator, who had held the rank of state councillor in the czar's civil service, and who was high in favor of some of the grand dukes in St. Petersburg. "The public expect too much of the medical man, who is unfortunate enough to accept the position of M. H. on the position of M. H. O. They forget, or do not know, that public health is not all medicine, no more than it is the all of medicine. The enforcement of the simplest health regulations brings him into conflict with regulations brings him into conflict with some of the ratepayers, to whom he looks for professional patronage," said Dr. Hodgetts. A number of instances were given representing the typical trials of the professional M.H.O. These included the locating of a privy or closet; deciding the disposition of sewage on lots let to persons who are willing to live in places unfit for pigs. ing to live in places unfit for pigs; filthy slaughter houses; piggerles where city refuse is used for feeding; retired farmers, who convey into village life the free but evil ways of the farm. The law does not define what fees should be paid to M. H. O. for services rendered, and his work is usually given free, or for the sum of $25 a year.

Insistence on the observance of
