Fables On Health

TO EXTRACT A SPLINTER
ONE of the most annoying of small accidents is to have a splinter of wood stuck into the flesh of the hand.
Moreover, the wound becomes very painful if the splinter is not removed. Sometimes it is possible to remove the splinter with a needle or other sharp instrument. But when the splinter is of soft wood this is very difficult.
Steam may, however, be employed without inconvenience or pain, and is very effective.
A wide-mouthed bottle, such as a milk bottle, should be filled nearly full of water as hot as the glass will stand.
Then the injured part should be placed over the mouth of the bottle, and pressed down slightly to prevent any steam from escaping.
This will cause the flesh to be drawn down, and in a minute or so the steam will extract the splinter, and at the same time it will relieve the inflammation.

WIDE COLLARS SMART

Chiffon capes for summer have wide Pierrot collars of velvet, several shades darker than the wrap itself.

OSTRICH FEATHERS

Ostrich feathers continue to be popular, but their use is confined to wraps now rather than gowns.

Adventures of the Twins

By OLIVE ROBERTS BARTON.

The next person to visit Doctor Bill's Hospital was the peacock. He marched in so proudly with his tail spread out like a fan and the crest on top of his head looking for all the world like a crown, that the Twins whispered to the bird doctor that they didn't think the visitor could be so very sick at all.
"How do you do, sir?" said Doctor Bill hospitably.
"I don't do at all," screamed the peacock in a high unmusical voice. "I'm perfectly miserable. That's what I am."
"Well, well, well!" declared the doctor. "You certainly don't look it." He felt like adding that of all the birds he had ever seen, the peacock was the handsomest. But he didn't, because he was afraid of making him vain. And he knew that this fellow already had the reputation of being as proud as Lucifer.
"What seems to be the matter?" asked Doctor Bill kindly.
The peacock folded his tail feathers together and then spread them out again, as he had a habit of doing when people were watching him.
"I don't know," he said at last. "I'm not feeling good that's all."
"Is it your liver, do you think?" asked the doctor.
"I don't know," said the peacock. "But I'm all green and blue, and they say that people feel blue and look green when they have liver trouble. If it wasn't for some other people, I'd be all right. I wouldn't feel sick at all!"
"Won't you tell us all about it?" asked the doctor.
"Well, I may as well, I suppose," said the peacock. "You see, it's this way. I live in a palace garden—and there are all sorts of birds there. I belong to a princess, and I love her dearly."
"But at night when she comes into the garden, it's the nightingale she listens to and praises, and when she comes out onto her balcony early in the morning, it is the lark she looks for in the sky as he sings his morning song. I don't dare to make a sound because if I did with my screechy voice, she would only laugh at me. That's what makes me ill!"
"Aha!" said Doctor Bill knowingly. "I see! It's only a pain in your disposition, my dear sir! That's what ails you."
"My what?" asked the peacock sharply.
"—It's nearer to your heart," said the doctor.
"Can you help me?" asked the peacock.

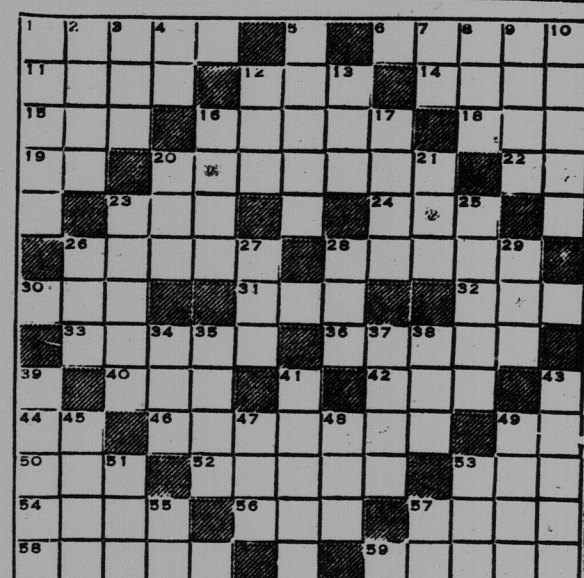

Dress Subtracts Pounds

And do you think you could teach me to sing?
"Not so fast," said the Doctor. "Not so fast!" Then he added, "If I gave you your choice of a beautiful voice or beautiful feathers, which would you take?"
"Couldn't I have both?" cried the peacock greedily.
"No," said Doctor Bill. "The sweetest songbirds aren't handsome at all. We can't have everything in the world. If you realize that you had your share of blessings, you would be happier."
"And would it cure my—my disposition?" asked the bird.
"Undoubtedly," said the doctor.
"Then I'll try it," said the peacock. "Good-bye! I suppose you don't charge for advice."

The Lure of Towns

The activity, the scope, the variety and gaiety of towns draw people irresistibly to forsake the free, healthy range of life in the open air for a sedentary existence. Nature cannot maintain the functions in working order under these conditions, and the result is only too frequently headaches, biliousness, dyspepsia, and other disagreeables, due to accumulated poisons in the system. In such cases Andrews is invaluable. Gently but effectively the occasional dose will correct life's little ills and make living anywhere a joy.
