able style of argument?

Dr. Tupper's reply was vastly superior in dignity, in fairness of argument, and in manly eloquence; but he labored under the disadvantage of having too much ground to go over, and it is difficult to maintain for four hours, his brilliant and impassioned style of oratory.

Huntington spoke, as he always speaks, well. With a tall, manly figure, a most musical voice, a vivid imagination, and a fluent tongue, he seldom fails to please, if he does to convince; and if one did not know the man and the things about which he was talking, one might easily be led into the mistaken belief that the member for Shefford was speaking the truth, and really meant what he said.

Mr. Palmer's speech, though cut in two by an anjournment, and throughout broken in upon by opposition voices, was a convincing argument, and throughout the opposition wished to drive the Government from power.

Unquestionably the ablest speech yet delivered upon the Ministerial side, was that of Hon. James McDonald of Pictou. This man is an orator and a Scotchmun, and consequently very hard to beat. In five minutes after he begins speaking, the Opposition benches present the appearance of a beleagued bee hive. There is commotion and a buzz of interruption; but this mild Pictou man appears to like it. They put questions to him, and get answers which "bring down the House."

They try to laugh and jeer at his arguanswers which "bring down the House." They try to laugh and jeer at his argument; but he tells them he doesn't expect them either to understand or appreciate his argument, as he is only speaking to honest, intelligent men! Speaking of spending money at elections he would like to know if there is a man upon the Opposition benches who will dare stand up and say he had not spent money in that way,—and one old fool springs to his feet.
"Ah!" says this cool-headed Scotchman,
