A travelling telegraph office is now in use in Great Britain for opening temporary communications, the idea being to have this moveable office carry its own pable, apparatus, and batteries, and betransported from place to place either by road or rail at the shortest notice, which can be taken to the wire when the wires cannot be taken to it. The carriage is constructed, so as to earry one of each of the different forms of instrument—six in all—in use in the postal system, and can comfortably accommodate eight clerks in full work. It also carries nearly one hundred and fifty bettery cells; and so skilfully is the accommodation designed that these are stowed away out of sight in odd corners, so that not a single inch of space is in any way lost. Half a mile of three wire, iron sheathed cable is packed snucly in the "hoot." and can be paid snugly in the "boot," and can be paid out and drawn in with the greatest ease
